Notwithstanding the malicious lies scattered broadcast against W. R. Merriam, that gentleman is daily growing in the esteem of the public. Every attempt they have made to blacken his character has been proven false and the malicious attempt but adds lustre to his name. Wherever he goes the people turn out in crowds to see and hear him. Mr. Merriam is one of the best business men in the state, and the only sin that can be laid to his door is that he is not quite 40 years old. We have it on good authority that he is not to blame for that fact and is not ashamed of his youth. He is an honor to the young men of the state, and an example they well might emulate.

Marshall County Leader: Mr. Geo R. Roberts, of this place, the republican nominee for representative from the 45th district, is a gentleman of wide and varied culture and high attainments against whom not one word can be said as to his sturdy honesty and integrity of character. He is an old resident of the valley, a practical farmer, a business man of wide experience, and one of those men whom the people, of their own accord when left to themselves, delight to honor and put forward into places of trust and responibility. Mr. Roberts has given much time and study to several questions of great importance to the people of the valley, and we do not hesitate to say that he is the best equipped man in the district to represent our interests in the next legislature. The railroad and drainage questions as well as important amendments to our state school laws have received a great deal of careful study from him, at a time when he had no thought that the people would take him up and ask him to do their bidding as one of their law-makers. Let it not be forgotten that in the case of Mr. Roberts it is really a question of the office seeking the man. Mr. Roberts' neighbors will all bear witness to the fact that he was taken up and put forward by them without his knowledge or implied wish. He has already received the promise of hearty endorsement and support from many prominent democrats, and when elected he will be a servant of the people and not a servile tool of any party organization or clique.

A Rousing Rally.

The citizens of Hallock held a rousing republican rally on Saturday evening. Judge Montague delivered a studied, thoughtful address, mostly confined to the tariff question; our candidate for the Legislature followed with an address which touched upon all of the living issues of the hour; Henry Wight gave an exceedingly witty address which put the audience in excellent humor and then Hon. Ira P. Shissler followed in an earnest, telling address, clinching all of the arguments advanced and bracing up the party faith in grand style. His speech was listened to with wrapt attention notwithstanding the lateness of the hour and all felt sure that his words were the words of an honest, upright and sincere man.

The Hon. Charles Canning.

That gentleman was in the city on Monday but did not stay to address his "constituents." Four years ago he posed before the people as the republican candidate for the legislature and was elected upon the presumption that he was an honest republican. The rumor was started in that campaign that he was really a democrat at heart, only pretending to be a republican because he knew the republican party was the strongest and he would have no show of election as a democrat. When asked the question point blank he gave assurances that he was a republican and, on his own word was taken on trust. He went into the legislature as a republican, made great pretense of being "the farmers friend" but we fail to see where he ever accomplished any real good for the farmers or anybody else. His intemperate language in that committee room is too well known to need comment and furnishes a sample of his invaluable works. How he can reconcile his professions then with his position now we fail to see. Then he made great professions of fighting the railroad and millers monopoly—now he is the avowed candidate for congress of those very monopolies—supported by their money and backed by their influence. One of two things is certain—either he has met with a radical change of heart or else he is not the "farmers honest friend" that he claims to be. To us his course savors strongly of the demagogue pure and simple. The democrats are trying to make a tool of him to elect Wilson.

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

Saturday, Oct. 6.

SENATE—On Monday the tariff bill will be taken up, Senator Allison will make a speech in support of the senate substitute. The bill will be temporarily laid aside whenever the conferrees on the general deficiency bill reach an agreement. With this exception it is expected to command the attention of the senate until disposed of. The assertion is made by some Republican senators that the bill will be passed within three weeks.

HOUSE.—Mr. Haugen, being asked what the prospects were of the passage of the bill of the Soo & Southwestern Railroad company for a bridge across the Mississippi at Alma, which is the bill to which Mr. Nelson of Minnesota objected, and that it would undoubtedly pass when a quorum is present, which will not be till after election. Mr. Haugen accuses Mr. Wilson, of Minnesota, of aiding Mr. Nelson in killing this bridge bill, at the expense of (Wilson's) constituents.

Monday Oct. 8.

HOUSE—At an informal conference of several Democratic members of the committee on ways and means it was decided that it would not be politic under present conditions for the Democrats in the house to send any resolution of adjournment to the senate.

The Yellowstone National Park bill was taken up, but not for consideration. It was pushed forward by McRae of Arkansas in the absence of Holman of Indiana, who is opposed to the bill, as a suggestion for speeches on other subjects. Two members were allowed to make tariff speeches under cover of it, and then McRae withdrew it. It is not likely to get consideration this session, and not at all if Holman can prevent it. Should it pass the house the committee's amendment given the Cinnabar & Clark's Fork railway right of way through the park would probably set Vest so wild that he would go to work and kill his own bill.

Tuesday, Oct. 9.

SENATE.—The resolution offered by Mr. Blair calling on the president for information in matter of the trial, conviction and execution of Riel for high treason in Canada in 1885 was taken up in the senate, and a long statement in reference to it was made by Mr. Blair, who based the resolution on the ground that Riel was a naturalized American citizen. The resolution was referred to the committee on foreign relations.

On motion of Mr. Spooner the house bill to authorize the building of a bridge or bridges across the Mississippi river at La Crosse, Wis., was passed by the senate with amendments.

The bill as to the counting of the presidential votes passed the senate. It directs that the certificates and lists of votes for president and vice-president of the United States shall be forwarded to the president of the senate forthwith after the second Monday in January, on which the electors shall give their votes; and that section 141 of the Revised Statutes is hereby so amended as to read as follows: Whenever a certificate of votes from any state has not been received at the seat of government on the fourth Monday of the month in which their meeting shall have been held the secretary of state shall send a special messenger to the district judge, in whose custody one certificate of the votes from that state had been lodged, and such judge shall forthwith transmit that list to the seat of government.

HOUSE.—The house has passed a bill appropriating $50,000 for the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act.

Mr. Nelson on behalf of the Indian committee called up a bill for the disposal of the agricultural lands embraced within the limits of the Pipestone Indian reservation, in Minnesota. Mr. Taylor of Ohio raising the point of no quorum on the motion of going into the committee of the whole on the bill, the measure was withdrawn.

The conference report on the bill to allow persons who have relinquished homestead entries to make another entry was agreed to by the house. The conference report on the deficiency bill was agreed to by both the senate and the house.

Wednesday, October 10.

SENATE.—Senator Harris of Tennessee, the leading member of the senate finance committee, in the absence of Senator Beck, said to-day that congress would probably adjourn on Thursday of next week.

HOUSE.—The house to-day agreed to the conference report on the general deficiency bill—the last of the appropriation bills—and adjourned till Friday.

Thursday October 11.

SENATE.—The general deficiency bill is on its way to the White House for approval, and when approved will close the work of congress in the matter of appropriations for the present season. Bills have been passed by congress and approved in the following order:

HOUSE—The first session of the Fiftieth congress is drawing near its end. The first decisive action looking to an adjournment is a conference that had been held between Gen. Clark, the clerk of the house, and leading Republican senators. Gen. Clark has claimed to be acting upon authority in making the statement that the majority in the house will assume the responsibility for introducing an adjournment resolution.

Friday, Oct. 12.

HOUSE.—Mr. Rice of Minnesota called up in the house the report of the special committee investigating the charges against Mr. Stahlnecker of New York in connection with the new library building. The report, which completely exonerates Mr. Stahlnecker, was adopted without discussion.

The house took up the bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. Mr. Fuller of Iowa, while subscribing heartily to the idea that the Atlantic and Pacific oceans should be connected by canals, pointed out his objections to the pending measure, which he contended was loosely drawn.

Gambling in Virginia.

George Alford Townsend says that the particular vice of Virginia is gambling, and he relates this incident of his recent tour through the state: "When I returned from Leesburg I heard two men talking behind me for the space of two hours, and their whole conversation was descriptive of games of cards held the night before—how one man had held two pairs and another had a full, &c. Into this game these grown up men of respectable appearance—men probably fifty years of age went with a minutiæ and a relish that was astonishing." At the Virginia villages, he says, you see the young men ride up at about 11 o'clock and hitch their horses. They enter the groggeries, in the back part of which, behind a sheet, are tables for card playing. There they drink bad whisky and win each other's money till about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when they mount their horses and ride home.

Last April H. G. Andrews, a young man of thirty years, was married to Miss Nina Kalger, of Leon, Iowa. They went to the northwest part of the state and began housekeeping. After four weeks they separated, she returning to her home and he going to Illinois. Not long since she began divorce proceedings against him. He soon came on and went to her friends to get her to live with him again, which she refused to do. Andrews went to her brother, Blufford Kalger, where his wife is staying, on a like errand. He had some words about Kalger, and without further provocation drew his revolver and shot him, the ball taking effect in the left side. The wound is of a very serious nature and may prove fatal.

Prisoners Craving Work.

Warden Brush, of the Sing Sing (N. Y.) Prison, is quoted by the New York Times as saying that he expects very unpleasant results from the idleness of the large number of convicts in the institution. "The men are discontented and very much dejected in spirits and are continually writing letters to the Warden and principal keeper, begging to be put to work at something, they do not care what. They dread being locked up in their close cells, some two in a cell, this hot weather, and only let out when it is time to go to their meals. The authorities do all they can for them and give them about an hour's exercise and outing after each meal. The Warden fears that before many days there will be cases of insanity breaking out; in fact, some have already lost their mental balance and been placed in the hospital with a hope of their recovery.

"I WANT MY COW."

I am not quite sure of dates, but it was late in the Fall, I think, of 1777; that a foraging party from the British camp in Philadelphia made a descent upon the farm of Major Rudolph, south of that city, at Darby. Having supplied themselves well with provender, they were about to begin their return march, when one of the soldiers happened to espy a valuable cow, which at that moment unfortunately made her appearance in the lane leading to the barn-yard; and poor Sukey was immediately confiscated for the use of the company.

Now, this unfortunate cow happened to be the pride of the farm, and was claimed as the exclusive property of Miss Anne Rudolph—the daughter of the ouse—aged twelve years. Of course, no other animal on the estate was so important as this particular cow. and her confiscation by the soldiers could not be tolerated for a moment. So Miss Anne made an impetuous dash for her recovery, but finding the men deaf to her entreaties and the sergeant proof against the storm of her indignation, the high-spirited child rushed over to the stables, saddled her pony, and was soon galloping off toward the city, determined to appeal to the commander-in-chief of the British army, if nothing less would save the life of her favorite.

Meanwhile, poor Sukey trudged along, her reluctant steps quickened now and then by a gentle prick with the point of a bayonet in her well-rounded side.

To reach the city before the foraging party was the one thought of the child, as her pony went pounding along the old Chester road at a pace that soon brought her within the British lines. She was halted at the first outpost, by the guard, and the occasion of her hot haste was demanded. The child replied:

"I must see the General immediately."

"But the General cannot be disturbed for every trifle. Tell me your business, and if important, it will be reported to him."

"It is of great importance, and I cannot stop to talk to you. Please let go my pony, and tell me where to find the General."

"But, my little girl, I cannot let you pass until you tell me whence you come and what your business is within these lines."

"I come from Dardy, and my business is to see the General immediately. No one else can tell him what I have to say."

The excitement of the child, together with her presistance had its influence upon the officer. General Washington was in the neighborhood with his ragged regiments, patiently watching the opportunity to strike another blow for the liberty of the colonies. The officer well knew that valuable information of the movements of the rebels frequently reached the Brittish commander through families residing in the country, and still in secret friendly to the crown. Here might be such a case, and this consideration determined the soldier to send the child forward to headquarters. So, summoning an orderly, he directed him to escort the girl to the General.

It was late in the afternoon by this time, and Cornwallis was at dinner with a number of British officers, when "A little girl from the country with a message for the General," was announced.

"Let her come in at once," said the General, and a few minutes later Miss Anne Rudolph entered the great tent.

For a moment the girl hesitated, overcome, perhaps, by the unexpected brilliancy of the scene. Then the spirit of her "Rudolph" ancestors asserted itself, and to her, Connwallis, in full dinner-costume, surrounded by his brilliant companions, represented only the power that could save her favorite from the butcher's knife.

"Well, my little girl, I am General Cornwallis," said that gentleman kindly. "What have you to say to me?"

"I want my cow."

Profound silence reigned for a moment; then came tumultuous bursts of uproarous laughter from all the gentlemen around the table. The girls face reddened, but she held her ground, and her set features and flashing eyes convinced the general that the child before him was one of no ordinary spirit.

A few words of encouragement, kindly spoken, quickly restored the equanimity of the girl. Then, with ready tact, the General soon drew from her a concise narration of her grievance.

"Why did not your father attend to this for you?" he asked.

"My father is not at home now."

"And you have no brothers for such an errand, instead of coming yourself into a British camp?"

"Both of my brothers are away. But, General Cornwallis," cried she impatiently, "while you keep me here talking, they will kill my cow!"

"So—your brothers also are away from home. Now, tell me, child, where can they be found?"

"And your other brother, where is he?" inquired the General.

"Captain Michael Rudolph is with Harry Lee."

The girl's eyes fairly blazed as she spoke the name of gallant "Light-Horse Harry Lee." Then she exclaimed, "But, General, my cow!"

"Ah, ha! one brother with Gates and one with Lee. Now," said the General severely "where is your father?"

"He is with General Washington," frankly answered the little maiden; "but he is a prisoner now."

"So, so. Fathers and brothers all in the Continental Army! I think, then, you must be a little rebel."

"Yes, sir if you please—I am a little rebel. But I want my cow!"

"Well, you are a brave, sraightforward little girl, and you shall have your cow, and something more, too." Then stooping forward, he detached from his garters a pair of brilliant knee-buckles, which he laid in the child's hands. "Take these," he said, "and keep them as a souvenir of this interview, and believe that Lord Cornwallis can appreciate courage and truth even in a young rebel."

Then, calling an orderly, he instructed him to go with the child through the camp in search of the cow, and when he should find the animal, to detail a man to see her home again. So Miss Annie returned in triumph with her cow. And those sparkling knee-buckles are still treasured by her descendants as a memento of Cornwallis and the revolution.

A Nice, Sharp Quibble of the Law.

Milwaukee Sentinel.

In, September, 1887, Benjamin Rollin and Mary, his wife, died of eating toadstools by mistake for mushrooms, the husband surviving the wife but a few hours. Mrs. Rollin held some property and an insurance policy on her life for $2,620.35 in the Northwestern Mutual Relief Association, of Madison, Wisconsin. She left a will in which her executor was authorized to pay all debts, and divide the remainder between relatives and friends, as designated in the will. Joseph Lavarisway, father of the deceased, brought suit against the company to collect the insurance and set aside the will. The executor, J. P. Thomas, demanded the payment under direction of the will in the interest of the creditors and all concerned. Meanwhile, Miss Jessie Rollin, a daughter of the deceased by a former marriage, commenced an administration on her father's estate and demanded the payment of the insurance on the ground that as her father survived her stepmother, he was the sole and legitimate heir to the whole estate of his deceased wife. In this triangular squabble the insurance company found itself in a dilemma. It therefore applied to the supreme court asking that the money might be paid to the court pending the decision. And then the court appointed a substitute or receiver, and the company was relieved of $2,524 which it had collected of the policy holders nearly a year since, it being about $100 less and without interest than when collected by the company. The company is thus relieved of its singular charge, while contestants will fight for the funds in the courts at the November term. Much interest is taken in the case and the final decision is awaited by many, on account of its peculiar complicated twistings.

He Had Gall.

Sioux Falls Press: The traveling public has gone so far in "putting it on" to the Milwaukee collectors that occasionally pass through this city it is time to call a halt. As long as they could beat the railroad, which was quite often, it was all right, but now the fly public has commenced on the collectors, and a halt should be called. Here is an example: A traveling man boarded the passenger train at Egan, and when the collector came around the aforesaid t. m. said he had no money, but would put up his watch as security for the $4.55 which it cost to reach his destination. The watch was yellow and the collector accepted it. At Sioux City the collector noticed the traveling man, who was walking innocently up town, while the collector inwardly chuckled to think he had secured a watch so cheap. After he was satisfied the watch would not be called for he went to a jeweler's to have its value appraised. It was found to be worth just $1.75. That collector was mad, and wouldn't now accept a diamond-studded ticker as pay to one of the railroad crossings in this city.

The traveling man hasn't showed up yet, and probably won't, therefore either the Milwaukee is out $4.55 or else the collector is ahead a yellow watch worth $1.75. There are yet several of these timekeepers in the hands of the knights of the grip, but they can never be passed unless there is a strange collector.

How To Test a Friend.

Study what your dog thinks of him.

See if he offers to lend you more than you ask.

Take him with you when you call on your best girl if he happens to be handsomer than you.

Note how long he remembers what he has done for you.

Give him an opportunity to better himself at your expense.

See if he breaks an appointment to go elsewhere.

When you have accomplished anything together note how much credit he takes to himself.

Inconvenience him and see if he mentions it to his friends.

Offer him the chance to escort home the pretty girl you met at your cousin's.

Judge him by what he does rather than by what he says.

Always be short when he asks for a loan.

Give him an opportunity to anticipate the favor you are about to ask. —Judge.

Exchange of Experiences.

A doctor, who had a great dislike to tobacco in any form, contrived, in his hurry at the railway-station to get into a smoking car. A young man sat opposite puffing away at a huge cigar.

After eyeing him for some minutes, the gentleman at last addressed him: "Young man, as a medical let me warn you against smoking. Experience has proved to me that of every ten men suffering from epithlioma and paralysis of of the tongue, nine of these have been caused by tobacco." "Sir!" exclaimed the youth, "experience has proven to me that of every ten men suffering from black eyes, nine of these have been caused by people neglecting to mind their own business."

GRAND-AUNT GARRAWAY.

"To my Grand-aunt Garraway's!" said Phœbe, bursting into tears. "Up in the Catskills, where one never hears anything but tree-toads and whip-poor-wills, and the grass grows in the middle of the road, and there isn't a wagon goes past, unless you count the hay-carts and the daily stage!"

"Horrible!" said Miss Parks, the sewing-woman.

"I'd as soon be buried alive!" sobbed Phœbe.

"I never heard of anything so cruel in all my life!" said Jemima, the maid-of-all-work. "Not even in the last number of 'Ferdinetta the Forsaken,' where the poor heroine is forbidden to—"

"Do hold your tongue, Jemima, and get about your work!" said Phœbe, sharply. "Who asked you to interfere? Mamma will be very angry when she comes in and finds the parlors not done up."

And Jemima slunk away rather discomfited.

"I am sure 'Ferdinetta the Forsaken' never would have spoken to a poor help that way," thought she with a sniff. "Miss Phœbe can't be a real heroine!"

While Miss Parks remained to console pretty Phœbe Tacson as she helped to pack the trunks which were to be sent to Grand-aunt Garraway's by express.

"And I'm not even to be allowed to bid him good by!" wailed the forlorn young damsel. "Oh, I don't see how mamma can be so hard-hearted!"

"Is he very handsome?" said Miss Parks, whose life had not known many love affairs.

"Exactly like a Troubadour!" said Phœbe, enthusiastically.

"Dear, dear!? said Miss Parks, with a vague idea of black velvet, a guitar and white satin sleeve linings.

"With melancholy eyes, and a moustache as black as ink," said Phœbe. "Oh, don't put my collars in the same tray with the French-heeled boots, please!"

"And what is his business?" said Miss Parks.

"He is here on a private embassy for the Russian government," said Phœbe, proudly. "But that's just what mamma won't believe. He says he cannot divulge his identity without betraying his trust. As soon as his mission is over, he says he will produce the most satisfactory explanations; but mamma actually believes him to be an impostor!"

"Oh, dear!" said Miss Parks.

"You see, mamma isn't a physiognomist," said Phœbe, "or she would read truth plainly inscribed upon his noble brow. The checked summer silks next, Miss Parks, though I don't know what use checked summer silks will be to me at Grandaunt Garraway's."

"But you can write to him every day, dear," soothed Miss Parks.

"They will intercept the letters," sighed Phœbe.

"Never mind," said Miss Parks, folding up an India fourlard polonaise; "the torch of love will burn all the brighter for a few brief obscurations."

"What a dear, comforting creature you are!" said Phœbe, stooping to kiss Miss Parks' knobby forehead.

"I, too, have passed through the fiery ordeal," sighed Miss Parks, returning the caress, as she packed a cologne-bottle and a traveling ink-stand into the muffling folds of a red Shetland shawl.

So Phœbe was sent to Grandaunt Garraway's, at the foot of High Peak, to get her out of the way of Mr. Middleton De Motte.

She was a little disappointed that the snug Queen Anne cottage was not more dungeon-like, and that the solitary mountain path turned out to be a well-traveled turnpike. She had made up her mind to thorough martyrdom; and Mrs. Garraway, instead of being a hook-nosed old crone, with a gold-headed cane and a temper, was a cheerful old lady, whose cheeks were tinted with fresh bloom, like a winter apple, and who wore a black silk dress with lace ruffles.

The parlor floor was covered with a real Turkey rug; there was a cabinet of old china in the corner; a little maid in a white cap waited at the table; and Grandaunt Garraway's jewel case was a marvel to behold.

The old lady had traveled in Europe, read all the newest books, and drove a little basket phæton with a fat, dappled pony, and, to Phœbe's surprise, she was eminently sympathetic.

"Dear aunty," said the girl, "I never daeamed you were as nice as this!"

"Well, my dear," said Grandaunt Garrrway, "I have been young myself, and I don't believe in putting too much constraint upon the heart"—(here Phœbe jumped up and kissed her)—"so, when I got your mother's letter, I thought the whole matter over. If you really believe you can't live without this young man—"

"Darling aunty!" faltered Phœbe, "may I tell you a secret?"

"Confide entirely in me, my child," said Grandaunt Garraway, patting her cheek.

"Well, then, he met me under the apple tree last night," confessed Phœbe, "by the light of the moon!"

"You've written to him then?" said Grandaunt Garraway, with a shrewd twinkle in her hazel eyes.

"Y-yes," owned Phœbe. "I told him it was unlike anything that I had anticipated. I described your pretty furniture and choice china, and the solid silver tea service, with the Garraway monogram on it, and your set of amethysts, and he came on by the earliest train."

"Oh, he did?" said Grandaunt Garraway.

"He said he was hungering and thirsting for one of my sweet glances," added Phœbe, blushing very prettily. "And he slept on the hay in the barn last night."

"My dear child, this will never do!" pronounced Grandaunt Garraway. "He must come here!"

"Here, aunty?"

"I want to see him for myself," said Mrs. Garraway.

"But what will mamma say?"

"Your mother, my child, has every confidence in my judgment," said Grand-aunt Garraway, impressively. "Didn't I tell you that it was no part of my theory to put an unnatural force upon the inclinations? If he really loves you so devotedly, he shall at least have a chance. It isn't in the fitness of things that my grand-niece's suitor should be sneaking around the back orchard, and sleeping in the hay loft like a tramp."

Phœbe colored a little.

"But what else could he do, Aunt Garraway?"

"For that very reason," said the old lady, with dignity, "I invite him here as a guest. My husband's nephew, Harry Sanford, is to be here to-night from Boston; but there is plenty of room. Harry shall sleep in the cedar chamber. Mr. De Motte shall have the red room. Where is he now?"

"I—I think he's having a cigar and reading the newspaper in the smoke house," rather guiltily confessed Phœbe.

"Go and call him in," said Mrs. Garraway. "Tell him he shall be welcome."

"She's a deal better than any Fairy Godmother I ever heard of," thought she.

Mr. De Motte was indeed tall and Troubadour-like. He had dark, pensive eyes, and wore a very handsome satin necktie; and if his finger nails were not as clean as Mrs. Garraway liked to see, and his pocket handkerchiefs were not of the finest linen, still people thought differently upon such subjects.

And even Phœbe, in a mental comparison, could not help owning to herself that Mr. Sanford seemed the most at his ease.

"But then," thought Phœbe, "he hasn't any diplomatic troubles on his mind. I wish, though, that dear Middleton wouldn't eat green peas with his fork, and that he would take a little more notice of the chair covers, and not drag them off every time he sits down. I never know before that he chewed tobacco. I hope that it won't make Grand-aunt Garraway nervous!"

Nevertheless, when Phœbe went to bed that night, she was not so happy as she expected to be.

For a diplomat, Mr. De Motte was not so remarkably intelligent, after all, and she was very certain that his grammar was not altogether correct.

She hoped that Harry Sanford had not observed it.

In the dead of the night, Grand-aunt Garraway's hand fell softly on Phœbe's shoulder. She started up.

"Hush!" said the old lady. "Don't utter a sound. Get up. Come down stairs with me."

"What is the matter?" gasped the girl.

"Your fine lover is breaking into my cherry-wood bureau," said Mrs. Garraway. "He has a complete set of burglar's tools. But don't look so frightened, my dear. The jewel-case is here, but it is empty. Harry Sanford has the pins and pendants at the county bank. He's welcome so all he can find. And Harry and the farm laborer have got his accomplice safely tied outside; and they're ready to seize on him the moment he steps across the threshold. But come! I want you to see for yourself!"

And, standing on the staircase, where she could peep through the transom-light into the back parlor, Phœbe beheld her Troubadour lover picking locks and prying open drawers in a most business-like manner.

In spite of her resolutions, she uttered a little cry.

Mr. De Motte looked up and saw her. The next instant the room was in darkness.

But, we caught the fellow as neatly as possible," Mr. Harry Sanford said, afterward, "with the empty jewel-case in his possession and a lot of silver spoons in his breast pocket. He's an old hand, the Albany authorities say. Light-fingered Lemuel,' they call him; and he's safe to get a long term in the penitentiary."

Alas, poor Phœbe!

"But how did you know he was a —a thief, Aunt Garraway?" she said.

"I didn't know, child," said the old lady. I only suspected that everything wasn't right. But don't fret. One doesn't expect a young girl like you to be the best judge of character in the world. Harry Sanford declared he was a rascal the first moment he set eyes on him,"

"You see," said Harry, "he never looked me straight in the eyes. That is an unfailing symptom."

And Harry Sanford set him so diligently to work to console the disillusionized maiden that he soon succeeded in restoring her temporarily eclipsed smiles,

So the expedition to Grand-aunt Garraway's proved a success, after all. The Middleton DeMotte engagement was broken up, and there is every probability that a new one will rise, Phenix like, out of the ashes.

Trick of the Cook.

Napoleon had a cook whose ability to cope with an emergency made him a worthy servant of the great soldier. The following anecdote illustrates the culinary tactics of the cook, which enabled him to be always prepared.

Napoleon's constant dish at breakfast was roast chicken. But he was so uncertain in his breakfast hour that sometimes the meal would be served as early as eight o'clock, and sometimes as late as eleven. Yet the roast chicken was always ready and always done to a turn.

"I do not know how it is," said he, "but at whatever hour I call for my breakfast my chicken is always ready, and always in good condition."

"Sire," answered the man of culinary genius, "the reason is that every quarter of an hour I put a fresh chicken down to roast, so that Your Majesty is sure always to have it in perfection."

A Wanting Element of Education

Some say train the intellect and life will become better and surer. But experience is against them. Learning does not beget virtue. The worst crimes of the past twenty-five years have been committed by men of the highest education. You must present virtue to the mind day after day in its brightest light, so that the mind will become enamored of it. You must endeavor to make the practice of virtue a habit, What is done for the hand and the intellect must also be done for the will. Moral training begets the one great thing wanting on earth—the thought of duty; duty to God and man. In the education of this country teaching men to be servants, to drive horses and labor in the street? I think not. It is largely without a moral side, and the sense that it is noble to labor, that every man has a duty to preform, is being destroyed. It produces a dream that it is ignoble to labor, that the purpose of life is to be a grand gentleman. All education that affords no moral training is incomplete. With all possible training we all know how difficult it is to be good.—Monsignor Capel.

A Gambling-House Episode.

I once witnessed an occurence in a New York faro bank which I shall never forget as long as I live. Among the regular customers of the game there was a young man who held a position in his father's office, a prominent down-town merchant. Although he was neither a cool nor a lucky player, and rarely left the table a winner, he still continued to frequent the gaming-table for no other purpose than to appease an insatiable appetite. Thus the young player naturally lost considerable money, and his father having discovered his haunts, sent word to the proprietors of the game, forbidding them to admit his son in the future. But the parties thus cautioned failed to pay any attention to this notice, and the young man continued coming.

One afternoon, about 5 o'clock, while he was sitting at the table playing, the bell rang and the negro servant admitted a tall, venerable-looking gentleman, whose hair was as white as snow. He stepped up to the table, placed his righ hand upon the young man's shoulder, and, addressing himself to the dealer, said:

"This young man is my son. I have cautioned you not to admit him, but you have not heeded my warning. I now give you notice that if you let him play here after this you do so at your peril."

The dealer looked at the speaker with an insolent contemptuous expression, and said, sneeringly:

"I don't care whether you are the father of any of my players or not. That young man looks as if he were 21, and I guess he is able to attend to his own busines."

Then, turning to the negro, he said:

"John show this gentleman to the door." And again he looked at the new-comer in a derisive and sneering way.

But he had made his reckoning without his host. The old gentleman drew himself up to his full height, and while his eyes flashed fire, he said, in aloud, clear voice:

"Ah, Mr. Dealer, you know very well that what I have been saying is no laughing matter, and, though only one man has blown out his brains in your room and spoiled your handsome carpet with his blood, you have not the less cruelly assassinated a dozen more with your devilish game, even though you may have done so indirectly. How many more of your victims have become suicides in consequence of your hellish operations? I dare say you do not care to know. You are a very jolly fellow, I have no doubt, and you drive fast horses in the park. Your plate is magnificent, and I am told the dinners which you set forth to the patrons of your house every afternoon of the week are good; but if you could have the power of the clairvoyant bestowed upon you I reckon you would never laugh or race or drink more. Everywhere around you you would see accusing ghosts pointing at you ghosts that would not only arraign you for their murder but for the infinite legacy of evils they bequeathed to the living at their death through your cause. Mothers, wives, and sisters starving; girls pacing wearily the pavements of the city at night, bidding for dishonor; boys, born to lead a better life, thieving in the streets because their father lost his money at your table, Mr. Dealer! Ah, sir, there is many a man that likes to make money and spend it as well as you, but he would not traffic in hearts and lives and honors even could he thereby acquire all the riches of the world and live in the very midst of gold. When a man pulls out a roll of bills and hands it to you to be changed into chips you know not but the happiness of his entire family is wrapped up in that greasy bundle. I declare I would rather never have lived than have registered against me the quantity of curses that have been heaped upon your head, you cruel, remorseless assassin! When I see you in the street, sleek and well dressed, driving a splendid turnout, I hate you, and were is not for the laws of the land and of conscience would put a bullet through you without delay. I hear the groans of breaking hearts in the roll of your wheels; I see the death-warrant of a thousand honors written in every wrinkle of your abominable, smiling countenance, confound you! Why are you at large? We chain up tigers and lions: Is there, can there be a more ferocious, bloodthirsty beast than you are?"

While he spoke everybody in the room kept perfectly quiet. You might have heard a pin drop. The fearless speaker was not again given the hint to leave. The dealer did not utter one word in reply. He finished the deal and rose from his chair, which was at once occupied by one of his assistants, and the game went on as though nothing had happened. In the meantime the old gentleman had left in company with his son.

The dealer took a seat in a corner and for an hour did not stir. He seemed to be absorbed in deep thought. On the first day of the following month he drew out his interest in the game and fitted up a saloon in elegant style on Broadway, in the neighborhood of 25th street. I remember well that the opening took place on the 1st day of May, in the year 1868 or '69, but the proprietor's mind became affected after the lapse of a few months. He at times grew so violent that it soon became necessary to confine him in an asylum, where he died a raving maniac before the end of the year.

A Peculiar Assault.

From the Chicago Tribune.

At Ironton, O., a high-browed and intellectual young reporter for one of the city papers attended an oyster supper given by the ladies of a church society. The youth was waited upon with all the promptness and fidelity due to his exalted station. His bowl of soup was full of oysters and he was charged nothing for it. On his departure he was given a paper sack full of the finest assorted cake. The young man showed his appreciation of this kindness by publishing the next day a half column article on "The Church Festival Oyster," containing all the time-honored witticisms that have been handed down to this generation on that subject. A committee of twelve young ladies waited on him at his lodgings shortly after the appearance of the paper on the street, took him into a smoke-house, tied him to a post, read the article to him and then deluged him from head, to foot with a bucketful of oyster soup that had been left from the supper the evening before. The muchabused church festival oyster is one ahead.

CROOKSTON, · MINNESOTA.

Woman is a subject never mentioned in Moroco. It would be a terrible breach of etiquette to ask a man after his wife or wives.

Two young men bought marriage licenses at Jasper, Ga., recently, but they both were for the same girl. One of the young men got the girl and the other got left.

The death of a Topeka man was caused the other day by a cake o soap, which slipped from his hands striking a small tumor on his leg and causing a fatal hemorrhage.

The question of whether A. T. Stewart's body was ever recovered from the ghouls who stole it has once more been sprung on a public which had about fogotten that such a man ever lived.

A gentleman who is just from Florida says that there is not a cigarmaker in the state who has had yellow fever. The telegraph operators at Jacksonville are furnished with as many cigars as they will smoke. Since the manager died none of the operators have had the fever.

Over seven thousand women have been assessed in Boston and will vote for school trustees at the coming election. A large number are Catholics, and another singular fact is that the largest registration of women has come from one of the heaviest Republican wards of the city.

In ten years the ratio of marriage in the large cities of the north has decreased eight per cent. This startling fact has brought out many explanations, but the one generally accepted is that so many men are crowded out of work by the cheap labor of women that they cannot think of marriage.

A writer in a Chinese paper asserts as a physiological fact that the Chinese lack the full complement of nerves that are possessed by Western people, or that their nerves are less sensitive than those of other races, and explains in this way the wonderful endurance of the Chinese, their impassiveness, and their ability to get along without bodily exercise.

Everybody has heard of persons who have been swallowed up by quicksands, and a dreadful death it must be; but here is a form of death quite as bad: recently Frank Gildden a lobster hunter, went about his task on the Beverly, Mass., flats, and while so employed stepped into a bottomless mud hole. He couldn't get out, and gradually sank until the mud closed over and smothered him.

An engine was derailed at New Haven in a unique manner. While the switchman was throwing the switch to let the engine pass upon the main track his shirt sleeves caught upon the switch lever in such a manner as to interfere with its movement. Before he could disentangle his garment from the switch the engine left the rails and was bounding over the ties. The ties were torn up for a distance of about fifty feet, but the engine, which was placed upon the rails after two hours' work, was not materially damaged.

Quite an amusing incident occured at Hawthorn, Fla. Two tramps, thinking that by playing offsick they would get free board for a month at the pest house, entered that town and reported at quarantine headquarters. The officers, scanning the cadavererous looking individuals before them, took fright at their unhealthy appearance and found safety in flight. Excitement ran high for awhile and the tramps were deserted in their time of need. The laugh was on the quarantine officers, but they gained satisfaction by driving the "knights" out of town.

A writer in the Milledgville Recorder, (Ga.), the other day met "an old friend in a strange garb," and he tells the following pathetic story of one of the changes brought about by war:—He was once a man of wealth and culture. Thousands of acres and hundreds of slaves were his, and his family lived in ease and luxury. The fleecy staple was to him like a mint coining its gold and its silver by the thousands. His house was a palace and his grounds appeared like enchanted lands. His home was a perfect Eden. To-day he walks the streets of Augusta, Ga., in the uniform of a policeman, and supports his family on $50 per month. And yet he does not murmur, but is thankful to his God that his lot is no worse than it is.

THE NEWS RESUME.

The Very Latest Associated Press Telegrams Greatly Condensed.

About Washington.

The annual report of the commissioner of railroads, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, submitted to the secretary of the interior states the railroads under his supervision are all in a very satisfactory condition. Steel rails have been substituted for iron almost everywhere. The examination of the books and accounts showed no errors or discrepancies as compared with the reports sent by the railroads to the commissoner.

Record of Casualties.

M. A. Pearson, a Swede about thirty years of age, engaged at work on the bridge on the Duluth railroad, was instantly killed at Palisade, Dak., by getting his head caught and mashed under a heavy beam.

A late freight train on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road struck the rear car of a freight train on the Illinois Central, near St. Charles, Minn., cutting the car in two and scattering the contents. The Milwaukee engine was considerably damaged. No one was injured.

At the fair grounds at Keitztown, Pa., the Roman chariot race had just begun and two chariots, each drawn by four horses hitched abreast, had made one circuit of the race course, when the teams became unmanageable and dashed into the crowd of spectators. Several people were fatally hurt.

Carl Reechster, a farmer living three miles from Omaha, came home drunk, lit a lamp and upset it in his drunken wanderings around the house. The building took fire and was burned to the ground. He escaped without injury himself, but his wife, 3-year-old child and the hired man who were asleep at the time, were burned to death.

H. F. Jones of Columbia City, Ind., while attempting to board a freight train at Millbank, Dak., fell and was run over. Both arms were horribly crushed, and also his right foot. He was badly under the influence of liquor. Three local surgeons amputated his arms close to the shoulder, and also his foot. The injured man is resting comfortably considering his condition. His relatives have been telegraphed. He had been working on a farm near Millbank for two weeks.

At the Badger paper mill in Kaukauna, Wis., Fred Hedky was caught upon a line shaft and instantly killed. The shaft was running at the rate of about one hundred revolutions, and a little burlap apron which the man was wearing fell upon it and was immediately grasped by the revolving rod, a large spike projected from the wall just beyond, and this was driven into the back of the man's head. The force of the blow bent the spike down to the wall, and the man went around several times and then dropped off dead.

Word has been received from Two Harbors, Minn., of a fatal accident which occurred at that place on the Duluth & Iron Range road. The ore train from Tower was derailed by a misplaced switch, and the locomotive and four cars were destroyed and Engineer Campbell was killed. The instant the engine ran off the track the fireman leaped, as did also the engineer. The engineer was buried beneath the engine and two cars of ore, and his remains were horribly mangled. Neither the fireman or any of the rest of the train crew were injured.

The corner stone of the Polish Catholic church, was laid at Reading, Pa., on Sunday. During the ceremony the floor, on which fully 3,000 men, women and children were standing, gave way, precipitating several hundred persons to the basement, a distance of fifteen feet. Over one hundred men and women were thrown in a heap and all were more or less injured, some seriously and others fatally. The wildest excitement followed, and the 5,000 spectators became panic-stricken. Cooler heads, however, went to the rescue of the unfortunate, and the injured were taken into neighboring dwellings and physicians hastily summoned. Later the wounded were removed to their homes and to the various hospitals by ambulances.

A frightful collision occurred near the Hannibal station of the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburgh railroad. A Lehigh Valley passenger, using the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburgh tracks between Oswego and Sterling Junction, collided with a wild cat train from Oswego on a curve in a deep cut. They came together with a terrific crash and the two locomotives were smashed into thousands of pieces. Engineer Martin D. Slattery, of the wild cat, remained on his engine with his hand on the lever and was instantly killed, the lever going through his body. His fireman, John Riley, jumped, but was caught in the wreck and frightfully scalded. Conductor Moss and Brakeman Thomas Maxey, of the wild cat were also badly injured.

Personal Talk.

Portland Oregonian: The following is printed in this week's Catholic Sentinel over the signature Dr. Al Sommer, pastor of the German Catholic church: "A few days ago an aged German arrived here from St. Cloud, Minn., and found a first shelter in the police station. He is eighty years old and his name is Frank Hartwick. He traveled with his daughter, Theresa Fisher, but the latter became insane, tried to give all her effects away, and finally jumped from the train some night at Pasco Junction and could not be found. The destitute old man says he has another daughter in or about Portland, either serving a priest or being in a convent.

Man's Wicked Doings.

Galius Bobeninlan, proprietor of the New York Hotel at West Superior, Wis., shot himself through the right lung by an accidental discharge of a gun while hunting. Physicians say he cannot live.

Phillip Palledoni, the Italian who murdered his brother, June 22, 1887, suffered the death penalty at Bridgeport, Conn. Palledoni was twenty-four years of age. He could neither read nor write, and could speak but a few words in English.

A man named Hickman, living at Boston, Colorado, shot and instantly killed J. C. Booth, a man who was in the habit of paying visits to the woman Hickman was living with. The murderer was taken from his home an hour afterwards by a mob of seventy-five men and lynched.

While engaged in cards, a dispute arose between Tim Keller and Dick Amey at Escanaba, Mich., when Keller whipped out a revolver and fired, the ball taking effect in the head, entering immediately above the bridge of the nose. The wounded man is dying and considerable excitement prevails.

While the police were arresting drunken Indians in Spokane Falls, W. T. they were fired at. A number of shots were exchanged. The citizens then rallied to the aid of the police, and one Indian was killed. His body is now floating down river. There were twenty-five or thirty Indians of the Nez Perce and Spokane tribes.

Last July a negro named Moore was lynched at Charleston, Ill., for an alleged criminal assault upon a woman. Afterwards it was discovered that the man was innocent and the mob had been guilty of murder. The grand jury has indicted 10 well known citizens who are alleged to have taken part in the lynching. The men are among the best known in the country.

Wm. Lahey, aged 31 years, escaped from Auburn, N. Y., prison by digging through four feet of solid masonry, composing the roof of his cell, and then sawing through the roof proper. The escape is one of the most laborious and difficult ever accomplished in Auburn prison, and it is presumed has required months of work. With a knife made into a saw, he cut his way through the roof and descended to the wall by a rope of braided twine, which he attached to the coping of the prison by means of a pair of pinchers stolen from one of the shops. He had converted this into a hook. Lahey is a Buffalo man and had only a year and nine months of a five year's sentence to serve.

Some time ago Samuel Winsberg, of Milwaukee obtained credit of J. V. Farwell & Co., and several other firms in Chicago, and got fine dry goods, consisting of silks, velvets and other expensive fabrics, to the extent of $5,000. He also got of Carples, Hartman & Co. of Chicago eighteen trunks which he never paid for. Then he executed three notes to Adolph Barling, which they admit was simply to give an appearance of genuineness to the deal. They then packed the goods in the trunks and shipped them to Milwaukee by American Express. When they called for the trunks they were arrested. Barling keeps a saloon in Chicago and Winsberg had a clothing store in the same place.

Some new developments in a celebrated diamond robbery have occurred at Duluth. About a year ago two of the inmates of Lottie Wolf's house of ill-fame were relieved of $5,000 worth of diamonds. It now appears that the police were satisfied at the time that the alleged robbery was a fiction. The diamonds had been but recently purchased of Simon, the St. Paul pawnbroker, and were not paid for. The woman vehemently denied all charges of fraud. Chief Doran accordingly ordered the house closed and intimated that an attachment would issue, or criminal proceedings be instituted unless restitution be made to Simon forthwith. Madame Wolf concluded to settle in full and so notified the chief. Thus explodes the heaviest diamond robber in the history of the Northwest.

The fourth attempt within a few weeks to murder passengers on the Boston & Albany railroad, by shooting into cars, was made the other night near Worcester, Mass. The Boston express was passing Rochdale, when a charge of buckshot crashed through the car windows. Some of the shot riddled a lady's hat but escaped her head. The broken glass flew in all directions, inflicting slight scratches on several faces. All the passengers in the crowded car were thoroughly scared. It seems as though there was a cold-blooded plot to kill some of the passengers. The shots have been fired from the same location and their frequency has disposed of the theory that they were accidently fired in that direction. In the first three attempts a 38-calibre bullet was used. The last one was a shower of buckshot. The populace are scouring the woods for evidence that will lead to the detection of the murderous person.

From Foreign Lands.

At the inquest on the trunk of a woman found in a cellar in Whitechapel, in London, surgeons who examined the remains testified that they were those of an unusually fine woman, who had probably occupied a good social position.

Mrs. Paran Stevens, a wealthy American lady, has accused her maid, an Italian named Anita Celanza, with robbing her of diamonds in Paris, valued at £6,000. The girl has been arrested. She asserts that her mistress sent the diamonds to London.

Slowly but surely public interest from one end of the dominion to the other is being aroused over the talk of annexing Canada to the United States. Ten years ago the proposition would have been regarded as treasonable in Ottawa, but there has been a marked change even in the past 12 month. The annexution question promises to dwarf all other political matters. It is practically the sole topic of conversation on the streets.

The Canadian propellers Mattawan and Gibraltar are reported ashore near Richmondsville, and the life-saving crew has been sent there to look after their crews. This is the wreck supposed to be that of the Sea Gull, but the latter is now all right in the St. Clair river. The Magnet reached the St. Clair river, too, and has since sunk. A tug is ashore about fifteen miles up the Canadian shore from Port Huron. It is thought the crew escaped, although the vessel is badly used up.

The London Telegraph published two sketch portraits from descriptions of the man last seen in company of the woman named Stride, one of the victims of the Whitechapel murder fiend. The result has been the unceremonious arrest of every man bearing any resemblance to the pictures, and a great deal of discomfort has been caused by this new phase of police activity. Many of the arrests were made by self-constituted detectives, or ambitious vigilance committeemen. The victims are generally discharged from custody as soon as brought before a magistrate, but some are unlucky enough not to be able to satisfy the officials of their rectitude, and are subjected to more or less annoying detention. One of the men arrested carried a bag, in which was found a razor. This suspect is still held, and will have to give a very good account of himself and his razor.

News Generalities.

Judge O'Brien, in the supreme court of New York, granted permission to Atty. Gen. Tabor, to bring action to anul the character of the Havemeyer's Sugar Company on the ground that by joining the trust it forfeited its coporate rights.

Father Kelly's room in New York was burglarized while he was attending mass. Harry Flannery, 17 years old, was apprehended as the thief and confessed that he had stolen $250 of the priests money. To avoid discovery he had already thrown a $100 bill and $20 gold pieces into the sewer. The mud in the sewer was sifted and six of the gold pieces were discovered.

Judge Perkins of Minnesota has decided the tax injunction case, in which the Sioux City & St. Paul Railway company is plaintiff and Cottonwood county defendant, tried under stipulation in St. Paul last winter in favor of the county. The decision goes upon the theory that the so-called trust deed executed by the company in 1871 was intended as a conveyance of the land, and hence the land is taxable. From $75,000 to $100,000 in taxes are involved.

In the awards of premiums at the corn palace at Sioux City, Dakota carried off her share of the honors. The first premium of $50 for the best exhibit of corn, grain, grasses and grass seeds was awarded to Union county, Dak., with Dakota county, Neb., second. Custer county, Dak., was awarded the first prize for the best separate exhibit of small grain, with Sioux county, Iowa, second. Dakota county, Nebraska, was awarded the first prize for the finest separate exhibit of corn, with Union county, Dakota, second.

Apostle Lorenzo Snow presided over the Mormon semi-annual conference at Salt Lake. In his remarks he gloried in the suffering of the saints for the sake of the Lord. He urged the establishment of private Mormon schools and said the membership of the church was never increasing so rapidly as now. Elder Jacob Gates said that as the prophets of old broke down the prison walls so the priesthood of the church would pull down its prison walls. The church must grow until it covers the whole earth.

The first installment of President Yerkes' imported Philadelphia cable car men arrived at Chicago. There were about twenty-five in the party. "We are not asked to sign any contract," said one. "They took most of us right from the cars and put 'extra' men in our places. Every man there would have come willingly if there had been enough 'extras.' Our way was paid, and it promised to be a pleasant change." Not a car is running in the entire north division. Express wagons and rattletraps of all descriptions, on which temporary seats have been fixed were run by the strickers and patronized to their fullest capacity.

The failure is announced of the J. L. Clark coinage works of Oshkosh, Wis. The nominal assests are placed at $20,000, on which it is estimated $17,000 may be realized. The liabilities are not yet given completely, but following are the principal claims held in this city: National Bank of Oshkosh, $20,000, secured; S. M. Hay, $16,800, partially secured; J. H. Porter, $14,500, not secured. There is also said to be $25,000 due outside creditors not secured, besides numerous small running local accounts. J. L. Clark formerly owned the largest match factory in the world, which was bought several years ago by the Diamond Match Company for over $250,000. Clark immediately erected a mammoth carriage works plant covering several acres of ground at immense outlay. It is stated that he sunk $100,000 the first year. Since his death his son Herbert has been conducting business for himself and mother.

Another Blow at Mormonism.

The supreme court of Utah entered a final judgement and decree in the case of the United States against the Mormon Church, which was pending, to dissolve the church corporation and to have its property declared escheated government. The suit was brought about in the supreme court of the territory under act of congress of Feb. 10, 1887. In that suit a receiver was appointed for the church corporation. He has succeeded in collecting over $1,000,000 worth of property, real and personal. The decree entered is a complete triumph for the government. It declares the corporation of the church dissolved, says the voluntary religious sect now in existence has no right to the corporate property, except the Temple block buildings, which are set aside to it. It orders the real estate of the corporation to be held by the receiver until the informations for the forfeiture for the same brought to a conclusion, and it declares all personal property of the late corporation to have become escheated to the government. It furthermore decided that the present church still upholds, teaches and manitains polygamy, and that any dedication of property to it would be for the purpose of upholding polygamy and would be unlawful.

THE WORST ON RECORD.

Frightful Railroad Accident, in which Eighty Persons are Killed and Many More Injured.

A terrible railroad catastrophe occured in Pennsylvania in which seventy-five or eighty persons were killed and a number injured The accident took place near Mud Run Station. A grand parade of Catholic societies took place at Hazleton and a large excursion was run from Wilkesbarre for the occasion, composed of lodges, band and sight-seers from Wilkesbarre, Nanticoke and other points along the line. The excursion train was run in two sections and upon the return trip the rear section ran into the forward section at Mud Run with disastrous results. Several cars of the forward section were telescoped and nearly eighty persons were killed outright and about an equal number injured, many of them probably fatally.

The accident occurred at night. The next day was a sad day at Hazleton. As soon as the news of the accident reached this city the wildest excitement prevailed. The depot was thronged with friends and relatives of those on the ill-fated train, all seeking information of their loved ones, but little was received, and all had to wait for some one coming from the wreck. As the hours advanced the suspense grew more and more agonizing, and the scene was most harrowing. A large number of the relatives of the dead and many who feared that friends were on the ill-fated train crowded the streets of Wilkesbarre from early morning. An immense throng surrounded the Valley depot and surged backward and forward in their anxiety to obtain the latest particulars of the sad affair. The scenes at the Lehigh Valley depot beggar all description. Hundreds of men, women and children thronged the platform and waiting rooms, the sole topic of conversation being the awful disaster.

As the morning hours advanced the crowds at the Lehigh Valley depot augmented until fully a thousand excited, sorrowful people moved in and out of the building in nervous trepidation. Mr. Essor, was at Supt. Mitchell's office all day, said the road carried 5,050 passengers on the excursion. There were eighty-seven coaches in all, and the train was broken into eighty sessions. Before the accident four sections of the excursion train had passed Mud Run. The train ahead of the one that was run into laid at Mud Run, waiting for a regular passenger train to go by. When this train passed, the train that lay ahead of the one that was wrecked pulled safely out. The other then pulled up ready to start after the expiration of ten minutes, the time fixed upon as the division between the running of the excursion sections. Every precaution was taken to warn all approaching trains that the section was on the main track, and Operator Slogan hung out a red light at the station, while James Hunnigan, the rear brakeman, was back on the culvert with a red light, which he says could be seen for a half mile down the track. James K. McGinley, recorder of deeds of Luzerne county, was on the section that ran into the preceding train. He said:

I was in the second car from the engine, and saw the train ahead of us. We were running at the rate of about fifteen miles an hour, I should judge. I realized that there would be a mishap, but I could not help myself. It was impossible to get out of the car, and I did not think it would be serious anyway. The crash was a terrible one, though none of us in the car in which I was seated were injured, nor were any of us thrown over the seats. But the scene that followed makes me shiver; I have heard and read thrilling accounts of railroad disasters, but never pictured in my mind anything like this. The horror of the moment cannot be expressed in words. We ran to the cars in which lay the injured people. One would say, "Oh lift that iron and take me out; for God's sake help me." Another would exclaim, "My leg is fast; cut off my leg; get an ax and cut it off." Still others begged for help in various ways and with the most piteous appeals. Every few minutes one of the poor victims would die. Some were being scalded by the escaping steam, some were crushed to death and some dying slowly of their awful injuries. To look on and be powerless to render aid was enough to drive a man mad. I hope I may never witness such a scene again.

The bodies of the dead were removed to White Haven, where undertakers cared for them as best they could, preparatory to removal to this city.

At 6:30 in the evening the funeral train arrived in Wilkesbarre, bearing fifty-seven dead bodies. They had been partially prepared for burial, and lay upon boards placed upon the backs of the seats in three passenger coaches. It was an awful sight indeed to look through the long coaches at the bodies, each covered with a white cloth, here the form of a boy of twelve years, and beside it a stalwart man. As the train drew up to the Wilkesbarre depot a dozen policemen were required to keep back the frantic crowd of friends and relatives who had come from Scranton and Pleasant Valley to meet their dead. The train then continued on its way up the Delaware & Hudson road to Miners' Mills and Scranton. The people in the special coach again began the clamor for permission to enter the funeral cars, but were again refused, it being alleged that no one had the keys. Several who were in search of missing friends became desperate and soon broke down the car doors and began a frantic search for their loved ones. Clothes were torn from the mangled and scalded bodies, revealing the gay uniforms of St. Aloysius men, cadets and other members of societies. Those who knew their relatives were on board also flocked into the cars and began rearranging the attire or covering of the corpses. Many were distorted and in horrible attitudes, and friends endeavored to lessen their frightful appearance. It was as the train drew up at Pleasant Valley that the most heart-rending scenes were enacted. Ropes had been stretched about the depot and guards kept the immense throng back. The shrieks and screams of stricken friends and relatives were pitiful in the extreme. The first body carried out was that of Oscar Gibbons, thirteen years of age, borne in the arms of his stalwart brother; then one after another forty-six white-sheeted bodies were carried out and given into the charge of friends. The shrieks and cries of the women and the hoarse shouts and imprecations of the men made a terrible scene. When all were out the train again pulled out to bear the remaining dead to Scranton, Minooka and points beyond.

There are ten bodies still unidentified. It is impossible to tell the number of wounded. Twenty-five were brought to the hospital, and numbers of others slightly injured have gone to their homes or are being cared for elsewhere. The loss to the Lehigh Valley Railroad company will be over $1,000,000.

Two Murderers Doomed.

The jury in the case of John Lee and Martin Moe, indicted for the murder of Charles Shaleen at Brandon, Minn., returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree and Judge Searle sentenced both to death. The trial, which took place at Alexandria, would seem more in place if it had been located in some frontier county. The defendants, two young men about twenty-one years of age, lived in Millerville, the same town where the three Schecher boys reside, who are also under indictment for murder in the first degree, thus making five murders which this one town has furnished Douglas county this year. They had always worked on a farm save a short time when they worked on the railroad, and at the time of the murder, June 19 last, they were tilling the soil for Joseph Wagner. A couple of days before the murder they went to Brandon, a small village on the Manitoba road. They were constantly together during the day of the murder, taking a drink here and there until, although not drunk, they were in a condition where they wanted to be tough. Each bought a revolver and a lot of ammunition, and gave it out that they were going to kill a man. In the evening they were in the right condition for their work. At a street corner they suddenly came across their victim. One of the two said: "That is our man." Moe added: "Yes, that is the man we have been looking for." And without further delay Moe pulled his revolver and shot Charles Shaleen dead. Moe was captured then and there, and lodged in jail, but Lee could not be found that night. The next moring Lee was found, lying on the ground within a few rods of the murder, with his revolver in his hand. He was also arrested and both taken to Alexandria. The feeling was very strong against them. It did not take the form of lynching, but when they came to trial no attorney in Douglas county was willing to defend them. In order that the most might be made out of their case Judge Baxter sent to Fergus Falls for C. C. Hough to defend them.

To the court's question, "Have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?" a negative shake of the head was given by each of the two men. In a calm, steady voice Judge Searle reviewed the case and seperately passed the sentence: You shall be taken to the county jail and there be kept in solitary confinement for the space of three months, after which time upon a date set by the governor of this state you shall be taken from there and hung by your neck until you are dead.

Perfect silence reigned and many of the spectators were more affected than the prisoners, who gave no expressions of feeling. When the sheriff was placing the handcuffs upon Moe the latter said: "By God, it's all right and no more than I expected." Lee has had a bad example set him from childhood by his father, and this act is simply the outcome of a drinking, lawless life.

The Rich Man Died.

James C. Flood, the bonanza king, died at Heidelberg, Germany, according to a dispatch received by members of his family in San Francisco.

Mr. Flood was born in Ireland in 1825 and went to California in 1851. He received a plain common school education. How his time was occupied between his school days and his majority is not known, but when about twenty-three years of age, in 1840, he sailed for California, making the long journey around the Horn. With $3,000 he returned to New York, but resided in that city only a year. Back again at the Pacific coast, like all the adventurers of the period, Mr. Flood had troublesome times, dissapointments and failures and plenty of hard work. In 1854 we find him emerging from obscurity and becoming known as the leading partner in the firm of Flood & O'Brien. The partners made money keeping a liquor saloon in San Francisco, which became a kind of exchange, much to the profit of its proprietors. In 1862 these men made their first investment in the Comstock lode, Nevada. John W. Mackay joined his fortunes with theirs the next year, and in 1860 James C. Fair became the fourth partner in the mining property owned by the firm. Whoever suffered by the collapse of the Comstock "boom" ten or eleven years ago, Flood and his associates came out ahead. It was Mr. Flood who projected the Nevada bank. He had for associates James C. Fair and John W. Mackay. After finishing the immense row of buildings called the Nevada block in San Francisco, and just before starting the Nevada bank, Flood made that heavy call on the California bank which led to its suspension and incidentally to the death of William C. Ralston, the popular Californian, whose fall and subsequent suicide were greatly deplored by the public.

Ignatius Donnelly Retires.

The Minnesota Farm and Labor state ticket, headed by Ignatius Donnelly, has been formally withdrawn by the action of the executive committee adopting the following document:

To the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, candidate for governor; S. P. McGaughey, candidate for lieutenant governor; William Welch, candidate for state treasurer; J. G. Schonbeck, candidate for secretary of state—Gentlemen: On the 28th of August last you were placed in nomination by the Farm and Labor party of Minnesota for the state offices named. Since then the candidate of the party for governor, Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, has made an extensive canvass of the state at his own expense. We find, however, that while in some counties our ticket would poll a large vote, perhaps a majority of all those cast, that in large region of the state we are without any organization of Farmers' alliance or labor societies. We find that all attempts to raise a campaign fund to put speakers in the field, or to furnish the voters with printed campaign matter or tickets have been to a great extent failures. Under these circumstances it is impossible to hope to carry the state; and this fact being understood by the voters, we will not receive one-fourth of the votes of those who really wish us success; they will fear "to throw their votes away," and will vote for one or other of the great parties, while those who adhere to us may, by voting one ticket, elect another ticket, which they really do not mean to help. In the meantime the campaign for a state ticket prevents us from giving our attention to the Farm and Labor to elect: Under these circumstances this committee has decided to withdraw the state ticket and give all their attention to the legislative ticket. We have not time this year, in less than a month, even if we had the means, to canvass a state of the size of Minnesota. If an attempt is made two years from now to elect a Farm and Labor state ticket we should begin four or five months before the election, so that if we have but a few speakers they will have time enough to visit all parts of the state.

We would appeal to our friends everywhere to stand by the local ticket nominated by the Farm and Labor party, and especially the candidates for the legislature. We are very respectfully the executive committe,

Eric Olsen, Chairman,
Nels Granberg, Secretary.

The jury in the murder case of Henry Schecher at Alexandria Minn., for killing Christian Blatz returned a verdict of murder in the second degree. The murder occurred at Millerville on July 16. There was a dispute of long standing between Blatz and the Schechers over some land. On the day mentioned Blatz began mowing it with a machine. The three Schecher boys, Henry, aged twenty-four, John, eighteen, Jacob twenty-six, attacked Blatz, shooting him dead on his machine. They were all indicted for murder in the first degree. They demanded separate trial, and Henry, who fired the shot, was the first to be heard. He claimed self defense, but was not put on the stand.

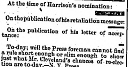
Republican Small Shot.

They Are in Sore Trouble.

The Cleveland Leader very truthfully remarks that it is a desperately forlorn hope when the democratic leaders turn in despair to the great republican Northwest, for electoral votes to help the Solid South put a Free Trader and pension vetoer in the presidential chair, and we can almost pity them.

Beats the Vanishing Lady.

Mr. Cleveland's chances of re-election as modeled after Mr. Atkinson's statistical chart would seem about thus:



Before his free trade message:
At the time of renomination:
At the time of Harrison's nomination:
On the publication of his retaliation message:
On the publication of his letter of acceptance:

To-day; well the Press foreman can not find a rule short enough or slim enough to show just what Mr. Cleveland's chances of re-election are to-day.—N. Y. Press.

The Truth.

Grover Cleveland has done more to advance the cause of free trade than any Prime Minister of England has ever done.—London Spectator.

Why, bless your ignorant eyes, the Courant copied that from the Spectator itself as soon as it appeared and set it going, but we've got the copy of the Spectator still in the office. There's no conceivable doubt of its genuineness—or its truth either.

But the Democratic organs, and especially the Brice Bureau of Intellect, are even disputing the tremendous Republican victory in Maine, where, excepting a few scattering members of the Maine House, the Republicans swept the political platter clean with a majority more than 5,000 above the average for a series of years.

An Insult Resented.

Des Moines Register: That little dramatic incident at Marshalltown, where an old crippled veteran promptly resented a democratic insult, has aroused the old fire in the old soldiers' hearts. It is not surprising to learn that the man who would sneeringly refer to disabled union soldiers as "d—d paupers" was a copperhead during the war, nor is it surprising that such scurrilous and abusive language should be used when a democratic administration sets the example of insulting the memory of union soldiers. Commander Consigney, who stands at the head of the G. A. R. in Iowa, has promptly tendered his congratulations, and proposed to appoint the old veteran, if a member of the G. A. R., to a position on his staff. It is too soon after the hardships and sufferings of the war for cowardly copperheads to insult with impunity the veterans who were disabled in fighting for the union. Every man with a drop of red blood in his veins will cheer the old hero who smashed his cane over the head of the politican who insulted him.

By Way of Comparison.

The senate bill is neither so comprehensive in scope nor so radical and sweeping in the alterations which it proposes so far as regards the customs list, as the Mills bill. The duty on no domestic product which the tariff has adequately developed or which it can develop is reduced below the protective point. Wool, lumber, salt and other leading articles of domestic industry which Mr. Mills and his friends put on the free list are either untouched by the republican measure or touched but slightly. The articles from which the senate strikes of all duties are generally those not produced in this country at all or produced in very small quantities. The reduction in the government's revenue which the bill would bring about is about $3,000,000 greater than that provided by the house bill. That measure takes $50,000,000 from the customs schedules—$30,000,000 by lowering duties and $20,000,000 by removing duties altogether and $20,000,000 from the internal tax list. No more carefully drawn or sensible revenue revision bill than that just reported in the senate stands any chance of passage in the present congress.—St. Louis Globe Dem.

Stubborn Facts.

If any Republican hears a Democratic neighbor boasting (says the Philadelphia Press) of the bright prospects of the Democratic party, let him call his attention to these results of this years' elections:

In Oregon the Republicans cast the largest vote they ever polled, gained the largest plurality they ever had, and greatly increased their representation in both branches of the Legislature, making it from two-thirds to three-fourths Republican.

In Vermont the Republicans cast the largest vote they ever polled at a gubernatorial election, gained the largest plurality they ever gave a candidate for governor, chose every member of the State Senate and made large gains in the lower branch of the Legislature.

In Maine the Republicans cast the largest vote they ever polled, gained one of the largest pluralities they have had in twenty years, elected a solid State Senate, made large gains in the Legislative House, and elected ninety-nine county officers chosen.

In Alabama the Democratic majority was cut down in the recent State election from one-third to two-fifths. The exact figure is not known as yet, but there will be a loss of from 30,000 to 50,000 as compared with the Democratic majority at the corresponding State election in 1884. This occurred, notwithstanding the Democrats have the entire control of the ballot boxes.

In Arkansas the Democratic majority of 45,336 is reduced to one of 15,026, showing a Democratic loss of 30,340, the opposition vote of 55,537 in 1884 is increased to 84,223, and the congressional district of Clifton R. Breckinridge, who is one of the godfathers of the Mills bill, shows an anti-Democratic majority.

What it Would Mean.

An able writer in the Irish World says: The re-election of Cleveland must be regarded as an unmitigated disaster, for it will place the Solid South in command of the United States for many future presidential terms.

It would give the confederate conspirators time to mature their plans.

Combined with the confederacy are the English represented by the Cobden Club.

If Cleveland be re-elected the interests of the North will be subordinated to those of the South.

The ex-brigadiers regretted that under Buchanan they were so foolish as to neglect to adopt Free Trade, as this would have effectually crippled the northern states.

With the aid of the northern votes they hope to destroy the North in 1888.

They hope to reduce the rate of wages all over America to the standard of England or the states below Mason-Dixon's Line.

If Cleveland be re-elected slavery will be in reality, though not in form, established.

How can it be done is explained by a glance at the state of labor in Queensland, an English colony and England the great hypocritical champion of freedom.

Labor contracts for a year at a fixed wage, and prison or the whipping port for violation of contract are its basis. It is no imaginary danger.

Cleveland is for Cleveland first, for the confederacy next, for England third, and not at all for the loyal Earth.

His letter has not explained why he changed his mind and insisted on having a second term.

It does not tell us why his civil service reform was all a fraud and a failure.

He does not explain why trusts and monopolies flourish under his admistration.

He cannot point to a single successful act of his administration.

Judged by this record he is a conspicuous failure, and judged by his letters he expects to win solely through his ability to bamboozle the American people.

Another Story of Lincoln.

"I was one of the senators," said a venerable Republican statesman the other day, "who favored the re-election of President Lincoln when that was a debatable question. I remember that one of the points they made against Lincoln was that he had appointed 'an ignoramus' commissioner of agriculture. That gentleman's name, you may remember, was Isaac Newton, and I think he was from Philadelphia. The graveness of the charge brought against him was that he could not spell. The opposition had gotten hold in some way of one of his note books, in which, among other ludicrous mistakes, was the word 'sugar' spelled 'shooggar.' Armed with this note book a committee of senators waited on President Lincoln and demanded the removal of Newton. Whether he was removed or not they were going to spring the Newtonian spelling on the world at the first convenient opportunity. But they thought it only fair to give the president a chance to remove him first. So up to the White House they went. When they came back I asked the chairman, a distinguished New England senator, what had occurred. 'Well, sir,' said he, 'Lincoln is no better than Newton. Would you believe it, when I showed him that wretched spelling of the word sugar, he said: "Well, I'm not sure but what that's right. Sugar spells soogar—shooggur spells just what it is. But whether that's right or wrong, gentlemen, is neither here nor there. I didn't appoint Newton, and therefore I can't remove him. Mrs. Lincoln appointed him. She has the sole power of removal in his case. You may go to her if you please, and if she removes him, remove him it shall be; but as long as he continues to send her fresh butter and vegetables and strawberries out of season, I don't think she will remove him."'"

The Largest Farm in the World.

In the extreme southwest corner of Louisiana lies the largest producing farm in the world. It runs one hundred miles north and south and twenty-five miles east and west, and is owned and operated by a syndicate of Northern capitalists. Their general manager, J. B. Watkins, gives an interesting account of this gigantic plantation, which throws the great Dalrymple farm of Dakota into the shade completely. He was cornered by a Post reporter at St. James Hotel, St. Louis, recently and asked to give the particulars of his gigantic enterprise.

"The million and a half acres of land in our tract," Mr. Watkins said, "was purchased in 1883 from the state of Louisiana and from the U. S. Government. At that time it was a vast grazing land for the cattle of the few dealers of the neighborhood. When I took possession I found over thirty thousand head of wild horses and cattle. My first work was to divide the immense tract into convenient pastures, establishing stations or ranches every six miles. The fencing alone cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. The land I found to be best adapted to rice, sugar, corn and cotton.

"All our cultivating, ditching, &c., is done by steam power. We take a tract, say half a mile wide for instance, and place an engine at each side. These engines are portable, and operate a cable attached to four plows, and under this arrangement we are enabled to plow thirty acres a day with only the labor of three men. Our harrowing, planting and other cultivating is done in a like manner. In fact, there is not a draught horse on the entire place. We have, of course, horses for the herders of cattle, of which we now have sixteen thousand head. The Southern Pacific Railroad runs for thirty-six miles through our farm. We have three steamboats operating on the water of our own estate, upon which there are three hundred miles of navigable waters. We have an ice factory, a bank, a ship-yard and a rice mill."

Gen. Howard on the Sabbath.

Gen. O.O. Howard was recently elected president of the Sabbath Union of San Francisco, which intends to extend its organization throughout the state of California, but he declined the honor for the reason assigned in the following letter:

"I sympathize deeply in the objects of the convention, and would do anything in my power to aid in establishing a law for the proper observance of the Sabbath. Not forgetting to be generous toward those who differ from me as regards the manner of its observance, certainly I would favor with all my heart a shutting up of those places which have become the centers of disorder and often of crime. But there is a delicacy on my part in accepting any position like the presidency of this convention, which belongs exclusively to the state of California. I am an officer of the general goverment, and, while I would work with you heartily in a Christian effort on the Sabbath day or on any day which does not interfere with my duties as an officer, I feel that I cannot accept the position tendered me. I therefore give you my resignation, and ask you to fill my place immediately, that your work may not be hindered."

Taxation of Bachelors.

A petition for the taxation of bachelors has been presented to the French Chamber of Deputies. It says that in Paris alone there are nearly half a million, while the number of married men is not more than 379,000. The Pall Mall Gazette remarks that the tax, singular as it may seem, has already existed in several countries. The French Convention adopted it. So did the old republics. In Sparta the women were allowed to drag bachelors into the Temple of Hercules and give them a sound thrashing. Plato condemned them to a fine. Rome made them pay a round sum. Camillus went further and forced them to marry the widows of citizens killed in defending the country. The petitioners say the tax ought to be doubly welcome—first, because it will increase the declining population by inducing bachelors to marry, and secondly, because it will help to make up the growing deficit in the budget.

THE THINGS TO DO.

Dr. Talmage Speaks on the Three Greatest of These Things.

The Troubles Into Which Women Fall —Lend Them a Helping Hand.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 7.—Although no building has been large enough to hold the audiences attracted by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., in any part of this country or Great Britain, for the last 20 years, the throngs in and around the immense audience room of Brooklyn Tabernacle seem to be increasing as the years go by. The opening hymns this morning were heartily sung by the congregation. Dr. Talmage chose for his subject: "The Three Greatest Things to Do." His text was Daniel xi. 32: "The people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits." Following is the sermon:

Antiochus Epiphanes, the old sinner, came down three times with his army to desolate the Jews, advancing one time with a hundred and two trained elephants swinging their trunks this way and that, and 62,000 infantry and 6,000 cavalry troops, and they were driven back. Then the second time he advanced with 80,000 armed men and had been again defeated. But the third time he laid successful siege until the navy of Rome came in with the flash of their long banks of oars and demanded that the siege be lifted. And Antiochus Epiphanes said he wanted time to consult with his friends about it, and Popilius, one of the Roman embassadors, took a staff and made a circle on the ground around Antiochus Epiphanes and compelled him to decide before he came out of that circle, whereupon he lifted the siege. Some of the Jews had submitted to the invader, but some of them resisted valorously, as did Eleazer when he had swine's flesh forced into his mouth, spit it out, although he knew he must die for it, and others, as my text says, were enabled to do exploits.

An exploit I would define to be a heroic act, a brave feat, a great achievement. "Well," you say, "I admire such things but there is no chance for me; mine is a sort of a humdrum life. If I had an Antiochus Epiphanes to fight I could also do exploits." You are right so far as great wars are concerned. There will probably be no opportunity to distinguish yourself in battle. The most of the brigadier-generals of this country would never have been heard of had it not been for the war. Gen. Grant would have remained in the useful work of tanning hides at Galena, and Stonewall Jackson would have continued the quiet college professor in Virginia. And whatever military talents you have will probably lie dormant forever. Neither will you probably become a great inventor. Nineteen hundred and ninety-nine out of every two thousand inventions found in the patent office at Washington never yielded their authors enough money to pay for the expense of securing the patent. So you will probably never be a Morse, or an Edison, or a Humphrey Davy, or an Eli Whitney. There is not much probability that you will be the one out of the hundred that achieves extraordinary success in commercial or legal or medical or literary spheres. What then? Can you have no opportunity to do exploits? I am going to show you to-day, that there are three opportunities open that are grand, thrilling, far-reaching, stupendous and overwhelming. They are before you now. In one, if not all three of them, you may do exploits. The three great things on earth to do are to save a man, or to save a woman, or save a child.

During the course of his life almost every man gets into an exigency, is caught between two fires, is ground between two millstones, sits on the edge of some precipice, or in some other way comes near demolition. It may be financial, or a moral, or a domestic, or a political exigency. You sometimes see it in court rooms. A young man has got into bad company and he has offended the law, and he is arraigned. All blushing and confused he is in the presence of judge and jury and lawyers. He can be sent right on in the wrong direction. He is feeling disgraced, and he is almost desperate. Let the direct attorney overhaul him as though he was an old offender, let the ablest attorneys at the bar refuse to say a word for him because he cannot afford a considerable fee, let the judge give no opportunity for presenting the mitigating circumstances, hurry up the case and hustle him up to Auburn or Sing Sing. If he lives 70 years, for 70 years he will be a criminal, and each decade of his life will be blacker than its predecessor. In the interregnums of prison life he can get no work, and he is glad to break a window glass or blow up a safe, or play the highwayman so as to get back again within the walls where he can get something to eat and hide himself from the cruel gaze of the world. Why don't his father come and help him? His father is dead. Why don't his mother come and help him? She is dead. Where are all the ameliorating and salutary influences of society? They do not touch him. Why did not someone long ago in the case understand that there was an opportunity for the exploit which would be famous in heaven a quadrillion of years after the earth has become scattered ashes in the last whirlwind? Why did not the district attorney take that young man into his private office and say: "My son, I see that you are the victim of circumstances. This is your first crime. You are sorry. I will bring the person you wronged into your presence, and you will apologize and make all the reparation you can, and I will give you another chance." Or that young man is presented in the court room, and he has no friends present, and the judge says: "Who is your counsel?" And he answers: "I have none." And the judge says: "Who will take this young man's case?" And there is a dead halt, and no one offers, and after a while the judge turns to some attorney who never had a good case in all his life and never will, and whose advocacy would be enough to secure the condemnation of innocence itself. And the professional incompetent crawls up behind the performer, helplessness to rescue despair, when there ought to be a struggle among the best men of the profession as to who should have the honor of trying to help the unfortunate. How much would such an attorney have received as his fee for such an advocacy? Nothing in dollars, but much every way in happy consciousness that would make his own life brighter and his own dying pillow sweeter and his own heaven happier—the consciousness that he saved a man!

So there are commercial exigencies. A very late spring obliterates the demand for spring overcoats and spring hats and spring apparel of all sorts. Hundreds of thousands of people say: "It seems that we are going to have no spring and we shall go straight out of winter into warm weather, and we can get along without the usual spring attire." Or there is no autumn weather, the heat plunging into the cold, and the usual clothing, which is a compromise between summer and winter, is not required. It makes a difference in the sale of millions of dollars of goods, and some over-sanguine young merchant is caught with a vast amount of unsalable goods that never will be salable again except at prices ruinously reduced. That young merchant with a somewhat limited capital is in a predicament. What shall the old merchants do as they see that young man in this awful crisis? Rub their hands and laugh and say: "Good for him. He might have known better. When he has been in business as long as we have, he will not load his shelves in that way. Ha! Ha! He will burst up before long. He had no business to open up his store so near to ours anyhow." Sheriff's sale! Red flag in the window: "How much is bid for these out-of-fashion spring overcoats and spring hats or fall clothing out of date? What do I hear in the way of a bid?" "Four dollars." "Absurd, I cannot take that bid of $4 apiece. Why, these coats when first put upon the market were offered at $15 each, and now I am offered only $4. Is that all? Five dollars do I hear? Going at that! Gone at $5," and he takes the whole lot. The young merchant goes home that night and says to his wife: "Well, Mary, we will have to move out of this house and sell our piano. That old merchant that has had an evil eye on me ever since I started has bought out all that clothing, and he will have it rejuvenated, and next year put it on the market as new, while we will do well if we keep out of the poor house." The young man, broken-spirited, goes to hard drinking. The young wife with her baby goes to her father's house, and not only is his store wiped out but his home, his morals and his prospects for two worlds, this and the next. And devils make a banquet of fire and fill their cups of gall and drink deep to the health of the old merchant who swallowed up the young merchant who got stuck on spring goods and went down. That is one way and some of you have tried it.

But there is another way. That young merchant who found that he had miscalculated in laying in too many goods of one kind and been flung of the unusual season, is standing behind the counter feeling very blue and biting his finger-nails or looking over his account books, which read darker and worse every time he looks at them, and thinks how his young wife will have to be put in a plainer house than she ever expected to live in or go to a third-rate boarding house where they have tough liver and sour bread five mornings out of the seven. An old merchant comes in and says: "Well, Joe, this has been a hard season for young merchants, and this prolonged cold weather has put many in the doldrums, and I have been thinking of you a good deal of late, for just after I started in business I once got into the same scrape. Now if there is anything I can do to help you out I will gladly do it. Better just put those goods out of sight for the present and next season we will plan something about them. I will help you to some goods that you can sell for me on commission, and I will go down to one of the wholesale houses and tell them that I know you and will back you up, and if you want a few dollars to bridge over the present I can let you have them. Be as economical as you can, keep a stiff upper lip and remember that you have two friends, God and myself. Good morning!" The old merchant goes away and the young man goes behind his desk and the tears roll down his cheeks. It is the first time he has cried. Disaster made him mad at everything, and mad at man and mad at God. But this kindness melts him, and the tears seem to relieve his brain, and his spirits rise from 10 below zero to 80 in the shade, and he comes out of the crisis. And about three years after this young merchant goes into the old merchant's store and says: "Well, my old friend, I was this morning thinking over what you did for me three years ago. You helped me out of an awful crisis in my commercial history. I learned wisdom and prosperity has come and the pallor has gone out of my wife's cheeks, and the roses that were there when I courted her in her father's house have bloomed again, and my business is splendid, and I thought I ought to let you know that you saved a man!" In a short time after, the old merchant, who had been a good while shaky in his limbs and had poor spells, is called to leave the world, and one morning after he had read the 23d psalm about "The Lord is my Shepherd," he closes his eyes on this world, and an angel who has been for many years appointed to watch the old man's dwelling cries upward the news that the patriarch's spirit is ascending. And the 12 angels who keep the 12 gates of heaven unite in crying down to this approaching spirit of the old man: "Come in at any of the 12 gates you choose! Come in and welcome, for it has been told all over these celestial neighborhoods that you have saved a man."

There sometimes come exigencies in the life of a woman. One morning about two years ago I saw in the newspaper that there was a young woman in New York whose pocketbook containing $37.33 had been stolen and she had been left without a farthing at the beginning of winter in a strange city, and no work. And although she was a stranger, I did not allow the 9 o'clock mail to leave my lamp post on the corner without carrying the $37.33; and the case was proved genuine. Now I have read all Shakspeare's tragedies and all Victor Hugo's tragedies and all Alexander Smith's tragedies, but I never read a tragedy more thrilling than that case, and similar cases by the hundreds and thousands in all our large cities; young women without money and without home and without work in these great maelstroms of metropolitan life. When such a case comes under your observation, how do you treat it? "Get out of my way, we have no room in our establishment for any more hands. I don't believe in women anyway, they are a lazy, idle worthless set. John, please show this person out of the door." Or do you compliment her personal appearance and say things to her which if any man said to your sister or daughter you would kill him on the spot? That is one way, and it is tried every day in these large cities, and many of those who advertise for female hands in factories and for governesses in families have proved themselves unfit to be in any place outside of hell.

But there is another way, and I saw it the other day in the Methodist Book Concern in New York, where a young woman applied for work and the gentleman, in tone and manner, said in substance: "My daughter, we employ women here, but I do not know of any vacant place in our department. You had better inquire at such and such a place, and I hope you will be successful in getting something to do." The embarrassed and humiliated woman seemed to give way to Christian confidence. She started out with a hopeful look that I think I must have won for her a place in which to earn her bread. I rather think that considerate and Christian gentleman saved a woman. New York and Brooklyn ground up last year about 30,000 young women, and would like to grind up as many this year. Out of all that long procession of women who march on with no hope for this world or the next, battered and bruised and scoffed at, and flung off the precipice, not one but might have been saved for home and God and heaven. But good men and good women are not in that kind of business. Alas for that poor thing! nothing but the thread of that sewing-girl's needle held her, and the thread broke. I have heard men tell in public discourse what a man is, but what is woman? Until some one shall give a better definition I will tell you what a woman is. Direct from God, a sacred and delicate gift with affections so great that no measuring line short of that of the infinite God can tell their bound. Fashioned to refine and soothe and lift and irradiate home and society and the world. Of such value that no one can appreciate it, unless mother lived long enough to let him understand it, or who in some great crisis of life, when all else failed him, had a wife to reinforce him with a faith in God that nothing could disturb. Speak out, ye cradles, and tell of the feet that rocked you and the anxious faces that hovered over you! Speak out, you nurseries of all Christendom, and ye homes, whether desolate or still in full bloom with the faces of wife, mother and daughter, and help me to define what woman is. If a man during all his life accomplish nothing else except to win the love and confidence and help and companionship of a good woman, he is a garlanded victor and ought to have the hands of all people between here and the grave stretched out to him in congratulation.

But as geographers tells us that the depths of the sea correspond with the heights of the mountains, I have to tell you that good womanhood is not higher up than bad womanhood is deep down. The grander the palace, the more awful the conflagration that destroys it. The grander the steamer Oregon, the more terrible her going down just off the coast. Now I should not wonder if you trembled a little with a sense of responsibility when I say that there is hardly a person in this house but may have an opportunity to save a woman. It may in your case be done by good advice, or by financial help, or by trying to bring to bear some one of a thousand Christian influences. You would not have to go far. If, for instance, you know among your acquaintances a young woman who is apt to appear on the streets about the hour when gentleman return from business and you find her responding to the smile of entire strangers, hogs that lift their hat, go to her and plainly tell her that nearly all the destroyed womanhood of the world began the downward path with that very kind of behavior.

Or if, for instance, you find a woman in financial distress and breaking down in health and spirits trying to support her children, now that her husband is dead or an invalid, doing that very important and honorable work but which is little appreciated, keeping a boarding-house, where all the guests, according as they pay small board, or propose, without paying any board at all, to decamp, are critical of everything and hard to please, busy yourself in trying to get her more patrons and tell her of divine sympathy. Yea, if you see a woman favored of fortune and with all kindly surroundings, finding in the hollow flatteries of the world her chief regalement, living for herself and for time as if there were no eternity, strive to bring her into the kingdom of God, as did the other day a Sabbath school teacher, who was the means of the conversion of the daughter of a man of immense wealth, and the daughter resolved to join the church, and she went home and said: "Father, I am going to join the church and I want you to come." "Oh, no," he said, "I never go to church." "Well," said the daughter, "if I were going to be married, would you not go to see me married?" And he said "Oh, yes." "Well," said she, "this is of more importance than that." So, he went, and has gone ever since, and loves to go, I do not know but that faithful Sabbath school teacher not only saved a woman but saved a man. There may be in this audience gathered from all parts of the world, the cosmopolitan assembly in all the earth, there may be a man whose behavior toward womanhood has been perfidious. Repent! Stand up, thou masterpiece of sin and death, that I may charge you! As far as possible, make reparation. Do not boast that you have her in your power and that she cannot help herself. When that fine collar and cravat and that elegant suit of clothes comes off and your uncovered soul stands in judgment and before God, you will be better off if you save that woman.

There is another exploit that you can do, and that is to save a child. A child does not seem to amount to much. It is nearly a year old before it can walk at all. For the first year and a half it cannot speak a word. For the first 10 years it would starve if it had to earn its own food. For the first 15 years its opinion on any subject is absolutely valueless. And then there are so many of them. My! what lots of children. And some people have contempt for children. They are good for nothing but to wear out the carpets and break things and keep you awake nights crying. Well, your estimate of a child is quite different from that mother's estimate who lost her child this summer. They took it to the salt air of the seashore and to the tonic air of the mountains, but no help came, and the brief paragraph of its life is ended. Suppose that life could be secured by purchase, how much would that bereaved mother give? She would take all the jewels from her finger and neck and bureau and put them down. And if told that that was not enough, she would take her house and make over the deed for it and if that were not enough she would call in all her investments and put down all her mortgages and bonds; and if told that were not enough, she would say: "I have made over all my property, and if I can have that child back I will now pledge that I will toil with my own hands and carry with my own shoulders in any kind of hard work, and live in a cellar and die in a garret. Only give me back that lost darling." I am glad that there are those who know something of the value of a child. Its possibilities are tremendous. What will those hands yet do? Where will those feet yet walk? Toward what destiny will that never dying soul betake itself? Shall those lips be the throne of blasphemy or benediction? Come, all ye surveyors of the earth, and bring link and chain and measure if you can its possible possessions. Come, all ye astronomers of the earth, with your telescopes and tell us if you can see the range of its eternal flight. Come, all ye chronologists, and calculate the decades on decades, the centuries on centuries, the cycles on cycles, the eternities on eternities of its lifetime. Oh, to save a child! Am I not right in putting that among the great exploits? Yea, it beats the other two, for if you save the child you save the man or you save the woman. Get the first 20 years of that boy or girl all right and I guess you have got manhood or womanhood all right, and their entire earthly and eternal career all right. But what are you going to do with those children who are worse off than if their father or mother had died the day they were born? There are tens of thousands of such. Their parentage was against them. The structure of their skulls against them. Their nerves and muscles contaminated by the inebriety or dissolutions of their parents, they are practically at their birth laid out on a plank in the middle of the Atlantic ocean in an equinoctial gale and told to make for shore. The first greeting they get from the world is to be called a brat or a ragamuffin or a wharf-rat. What to do with them is the question often asked. There is another question quite as pertinent, and that is, what they are going to do with us? They will, ten or eleven years from now, have as many votes as the same number of well-born children, and they will hand this land over to monarchy and political damnation just as sure as we neglect them. Suppose we each one of us save a boy or save a girl. You can do it. Will you? I will. Take a cake of perfumed soap and a fine-toothed comb and a New Testament and a little candy and prayer and a piece of cake and faith in God and common sense, and begin this afternoon.

But how shall we get ready for one or all of these three exploits? We shall make a dead failure if in our own strength we try to save a man or woman or child. But my text suggests where we are to get equipment. "The people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits." We must know Him through Jesus Christ in our own salvation and then we shall have His help in the salvation of others. And while you are saving strangers you may save some of your own kin. You think your brothers and sisters and children and grandchildren all safe, but they are not dead and no one is safe till he is dead. On the English coast there was a wild storm and a wreck in the offing and the cry was, "Man the lifeboat." But Harry, the usual leader of the sailors' crew, was not to be found, and they went without him and brought back all the shipwrecked people except one. By this time Harry, the leader of the crew, appeared and said, "Why did you leave that one?" The answer was, "He could not help himself at all and we could not get him into the boat." "Man the life boat," shouted Harry, "and we will go for that one." "No," said his aged mother, standing by, "you must not go. I lost your father in a storm like this, and your brother Will went off six years ago, and I have not heard word from Will since he left, and I don't know where he is, and I don't know what has happened to him, poor Will, and I cannot let you also go, for I am old and dependent on you." His reply was: "Mother, I must go and save that one man, and if I am lost God will take care of you in your old days." The lifeboat put out, and after an awful struggle with the sea they picked the poor fellow out of the rigging just in time to save his life, and started for the shore. And as they came within speaking distance, Harry, just before he fainted from the over-exertion, cried out: "We saved him, and tell mother it was brother Will." Oh, yes, my friends, let us start out to save some one for time and for eternity, some man, some woman, some child. And who knows but it may, directly or indirectly, be the salvation of one of our own kindred, and that will be an exploit worthy of celebration when the world itself is shipwrecked and the sun has gone out like a spark from a smitten anvil and all the stars are dead!

Worrying Queen Victoria.

Poor Queen Victoria is having a lot of things to worry her lately. This week a letter has been addressed to her which, it is officially declared, has by its want of loyalty filled the Queen with grief. Lewis Lyons, a socialist tailor, who displays a deplorable lack of respect for royality, has written to the Queen the following letter:

Madam: A royal commission on sweating will assemble in November to receive further evidence on the sweating system. May I ask your majesty whether you will give me permission to send your majesty's name to the committee, in order that you may be able to give evidence and to tell the committee what is paid for the raiments of royal household, in what sweater's dens they are made, and how much the poor workers receive for their long hours of toil?

The fact is that at one of the sittings of the committee on the starvation labor system it was shown that the magnificent embroidery of her majesty's carriage cushions had been worked by a cripple living in a garret, and paid barley sufficient to keep off starvation. This fact, of course, makes Lewis' disloyal letter all the more painful to the Queen.

A young man named Ed Ward was killed in the Curtis & Lawrence saw mill at Motley, Minn. He had been engaged all summer operating the windlass that draws the logs into the mill. His clothing caught on the chain while the logs were being drawn up and before he could extricate himself or others could come to his assistance he was drawn in and crushed between the chain and windlass. His neck and one arm were broken. The windlass is controlled by a rope, which, as usual, he had tied while the logs were coming up.

Like a Romance.

From the Chicago Mail.

One night just after the big fire three young men sat down in the ruins and talked about what would probably be their fate. These three men were H. G. Prout, a Mr. Boardman, and a newspaper man. Prout was a quiet, determined sort of fellow whose home was in Riverside. His occupation was that of a civil engineer. His proposition was that they should leave the city and the country and cast their fortunes with the Khedive in Egypt. He made a glowing picture of the land of the Nile and predicted fortune and fame. There was no outlook here. They decided to go. In the midst of their arrangements Boardman received a flattering offer to go to New York, which he accepted and the newspaper man received one to go elsewhere, which he accepted. Prout accepted his fate and started alone for a world he had never seen and of which he knew comparatively little. Of his journey there and his first experience there is not much to say. In time he reported to Gen. (Chinese) Gordon and became one of his most faithful and trusted aids. After a short service he was promoted and had the title of governor-general of the provinces of the interior. His capital was Lado, a point 1,000 miles south of any white settlement. Here the young Chicagoan ruled and reigned in a sort of Oriental magnificence—for that country—which makes his life one of romance. He had his courtiers and couriers, who did him the homage due a potentate. Many of the manners and customs of the people of that land were retained by him. He had his troops, and with them made invasions and conquests, and now and then discovered a race of beings of which history and explorations had made no mention. In the fastnesses of one of the mountains he found a tribe of blacks who were giants in physique and more than the average uncivilized tribes in intellect. He gave dress parades before them and made such ostentatious display that they enlisted under his banner. He found their perceptions quick. They learned the evolutions of his tactics in remarkably short time, and everything he taught they grasped with eagerness, and made good soldiers.

He was restless and in consequence he pushed his invasions and came back loaded with the riches of some remote tribe. He had enough of the romantic in his make-up to adapt himself to the religious forms of the country, and his capital at times presented a strange appearance.

Having spent much of his time in the service of the Khedive in the manner stated, the government at length concluded to negotiate with England for the purchase of gunboats for its service. Gen. Gorden sent Prout to London for that purpose. He had a leave of absence in order to do this work. Having made his purchases in London, he asked for an extension of his leave of absence, which was granted. He turned his face toward his native country. He reached New York, tarried there one day, and came west. He reached St. Louis and saw his friend, whom he had left in Chicago, and tried to go with him to Texas, where he had a railroad scheme. He left St. Louis on the day of his arrival and went to Fort Leavenworth, where he married a young lady whose acquaintance he had formed before he had left the United States.

They went to Chicago on their bridal trip. The life in Egypt had made inroads on the constitution of Prout. He placed himself under the care of a noted physician, who told him that a return to Egypt meant certain death. He resigned his position in the service of the Khedive and, having made an extended tour of the Continent, he returned to the United States. To-day he is at the head of a big printing concern in New York City, and his close associations with his old friend Boardman. The other friend is in Chicago in the newspaper business.

Prout's Egyptian romance and experience netted him a small fortune in cash, and gave him an insight of life that has made him a contented man.

Unchanged.

It is hard to be thrust, over and over again, upon a realization of the grim facts of life. Nancy Staines was not the beauty of the family, but she did exaggerate her plainness, and brooded over it whenever she was tired, or her spirits were low. One day, however, her fall bonnet came home from the milliner's, and in rejoicing over its beauty, Nancy forgot to lament her own shortcomings.

In high feather, she went to her room to try it on, but presently returned with a most woe-begone visage.

"Why, Nancy, what's the matter?" asked a sympathetic visitor.

"Oh, nothing important," said Nancy, gloomily.

"But there must be! It's that bonnet, I know. What's the trouble with it?"

"Oh, the bonnet is all right," said the despondent one. "It isn't the bonnet that's to blame. You see, it's a very pretty one, and as soon as I saw it, I felt quite discouraged, but when I tried it on, and looked in the glass, I found the same old Nance inside it!"

The Season's Manly Sports.

Mrs. Scrubbins: "Oh, dear! I'll be so glad when the hunting and fishing season is over. My husband is awfully fond of such manly sports, but he always overexerts himself." Caller: "I should think he would learn by experience." "Well, he don't. He got back last night so tired he could hardly walk and this morning he's up-stairs with the awfulest headache, and he can't eat a thing. Such a time as he must have had keeping out of the way of snakes. He thinks he sees 'em yet."—Philadelphia Record.

Moxie.

Old men use Moxie the year round to keep their nervous system strong enough to support the functions of their body, and mend up the break down of a long business life. The young city bloods to remove the effects from liquors and a night of dissipation. A tumbler full will break a recent intoxication in an hour, with no ill effects of stimulation.

Michael Quinn, a farmer of Jamestown, Dak., was run over and killed by a Northern Pacific engine running light at Medina. Quinn was in the section house and ran out on hearing the engine approach, presumably to catch his team which stood unhitched on the other side of the track, but when he reached the track he stood still and allowed the engine to run him down. This strange action can only be explained by supposition. Quinn had no relatives in Dakota, but owned a farm and six hundred bushels of wheat.

A FASCINATING GHOST.

"WANTED—A young gentleman who knows how to spell, and who writes a good hand, to do copying in the country for two or three months. Must remain in employer's house. Address, in own hand, stating what salary is expected, X, this office."

This was an advertisement I cut out of the Evening Post one spring afternoon. For half an hour I had stood the vociferous offerings of "Fourth Editions" and "Extras" without number, and for half an hour sheets of various political complexions had been thrust under my nose without effect, for I had been out of employment so long that my stock of money was nearly exhausted, and it had been a good many days since I had allowed myself the luxury of a paper. But, at last, I was over-persuaded by a very small but remarkably pertinacious newsboy, and for fear of other temptations, put the paper hastily in my pocket and went home.

In the old days I had been bookkeeper for the late concern of Simpson & Co., and while with them I had been getting a good salary, and, to my sorrow be it said, lived pretty well up to it; so I made nothing by the failure of the concern, and lost my place as well, I had to come down very low. I had saved a little, more by good-luck than from forethought, and this little, used with the strictest economy, and added to by a few pounds made here and there in odd ways, was all that had kept me alive for eighteen months. However, I didn't feel quite disposed to go to the dogs yet, for there was always a chance of something turning up in a great city.

As I looked around the room that evening I realized how bare it was of either furniture or adornments; how unlike—Ah, well, there was my paper; and I unfolded it with all the glee of a child over a new story-book. There was, of course, the usual political news, the usual number of railway accidents and criminal proceedings; there were items of interest to investors and theater-goers and travelers, but nothing for me, I had no money to invest, or for theaters, or traveling. So I skipped all that and went on to the advertisements, and the only one of them all worth reading twice was—

"WANTED—A young gentleman who knows how to spell, and who writes a good hand, to do copying in the country for two or three months. Must remain in employer's house. Address, in own hand stating what salary is expected, X, this office."

I read it two or three times, and then decided it was worth trying. So I hunted up a sheet of paper, and addressed X as follows:

"MY DEAR MR., MRS., or MISS X.: I notice your advertisement in to-day's issue of the Evening Post. My handwriting you can see for yourself. My spelling, I think, is usually correct, and there is no doubt I am a gentleman. As to salary, I don't know what to say—I don't wish to value my services at more than they're worth. Should you mean by 'remain in employer's house,' that I would be boarded and lodged at your expense, my price—that is, asking price—is one pound a week. Yours respectfully,

"JAMES W. WOLCOTT."

The next afternoon I heard from my friend X., who proved to be a man. His letter ran thus:

"JAMES W. WOLCOTT, ESQ.—

"MY DEAR SIR:—You may be a gentleman, write a good hand and know how to spell, but you're a fool. I enclose seventy cents, the fare to——. You will take the 7 A. M. train to-morrow morning from the Central Station, and when you arrive at——, ask for my carriage, as it will be there to meet you.

Yours, etc.,

"SOL. HUMPHREYS."

Sol. Humphreys!—the last man in the world I would voluntarily have written to, and for employment, too! Two years before I had a very nice little flirtation with pretty Mabel Humphreys, and it had gone so far that if the crash in my affairs had not occurred, I believe there might have been an understanding, if not an engagement. But as it was, I put away all thoughts of love and love-making, and dropped pretty Mabel very suddenly, without any kind of an understanding, and I had not seen her since. And now to think I had fairly got myself into it again! But, I reflected, I might not see much of Mabel after all. So much the better. Bread and butter was a necessity, and I would go and make the best of it.

The next morning I caught the train, but missed my breakfast, and by the time I reached the house I was decidedly hungry.

Mr. Humphreys met me at the door, and I was pleased to see he did not seem to remember me at all. He put up his eye-glasses and inspected me from head to foot.

"So you're James W. Wolcott, are you, young man?"

I told him he was not mistaken. I always had that name—born with it, I believed.

"And you think you're a gentleman?"

I begged his pardon—didn't think anything about it; it was a self-evident fact.

The old fellow grinned. "Suppose you come in and have some breakfast. You haven't had any, I suppose?"

I said I had not.

"Well, come in and have some."

After breakfast Mr. Humphreys led the way into the library, and motioned me to take a chair, while he explained what my work was to be. He had been writing a history, or textbook of ferns—he was an enthusiastic botanist—and wanted it copied for press. The work of rewriting the whole thing legibly was more than he wished to undertake, so he had advertised for an amanuensis.

After this had been explained to me, Mr. Humphreys started up. "Get your hat, Mr. Wolcott. I want to show you about."

All through the house and all over the place he took me, and when he got to the farther extremity of the grounds he paused, and pointing to a huge house beyond, said, "I'm trying to buy that house, but my daughter objects."

I asked him why she objected.

"Well, you see, it hasn't been occupied lately, and she says it's gloomy, says its haunted and she wouldn't like to live in it."

"Miss Humphreys can't really believe that to be true," I answered.

"I don't know whether she does or not. She's away now, but she'll be home to-morrow, and perhaps she'll be more reasonable."

The next day Mabel arrived. She met me politely, went through the introduction gracefully, and acted as if she had never seen me before. There was not the slightest half glance of recognition; she evidently intended to consider me a recent acquaintance. With curious inconsistency I could not help being a little disappointed, while at the same time I was much relieved. I don't know what I had expected—a start, a blush, just the shy pleased look of a girl towards an old friend not yet forgotten; or was it haughtiness, hardly veiled anger, disgust? Whatever I had expected, I got nothing at all but pleasant, meaningless words, great politeness, great civility. I had nothing whatever to do with, and could have no interest in, the intimacy that formerly existed between Mabel Humphreys and James Wolcott; he was one man, and I was another. And so the days went on, and she was always friendly with her father's copyist.

Towards the end of July, Ned Humphreys came home and brought Mr. Butter-Scotch Steele with him. Mr. Steel's baptismal name was William, but he had been re-christened by his friends Butter-Scotch, on account of his fondness for that particular kind of sweets.

Ned was quite a boy and a capital fellow at that, and he and I soon became firm friends; but Butter-Scotch I loathed. I really don't know why I loathed him so much, unless it was a rumor afloat that Mabel was making up her mind to renounce a single life, and henceforth stick to Butter-Scotch. Of, course, this of itself was enough to make me contemplate placing an extraordinary bent pin on his chair, or converting his overcoat pocket into a repository for a litter of baby kittens. But independently of this rumor, I had a distinct and positive impression that I loathed the man just as he was, whether he ever succeeded in marrying Mabel or not. Of course, it was none of my business, but it did seem a pity to stand by and see her become the missing rib, thereby completing the anatomy, of such a molly-coddle.

One morning I was standing on the porch when Mabel came out. "Mr. Wolcott," she said, "are you going to be busy for a few minutes!"

"I think not," I replied. "Mr. Humphreys doesn't want to begin for half an hour yet."

Over to the croquet ground we strolled, and Mabel sat down on one of the rustic seats. Without preamble of any kind she began:

"I know you have a friendly feeling for us all, Mr. Wolcott, and I want to ask your opinion and advice."

I bowed, for she was unquestionably right about my friendly feeling, but I wondered what was coming.

She went on: "What do you think of Mr. Steele?"

Well, that was a poser! What did I think of Butter-Scotch? That he was a fool, of course; but I reflected it wouldn't do to tell her so, particularly if she was going to——Oh, no! it wouldn't do at all.

"Why do you ask, Miss Humphreys?"

"I will tell you frankly. There is a very strong inclination on papa's part to buy yonder house."

"Yes, I know there is."

"And I don't want him to."

"May I ask why not?"

"Because it's haunted."

"I don't see how that affects Mr. Steele,—he isn't haunted."

Mabel laughed. "I don't suppose he is. But that isn't what I mean. I want to know if he is courageous enough to go there and see if it really is haunted."

"Oh, I dare say he's pretty brave; he says he is, and Mr. Humphreys thinks so too, I believe."

"Yes, papa is so enthusiastic over him—I mean Mr. Steele's kind heart and religious feeling; he thinks he must be a good man and not easily frightened." She looked at me steadily. "And I want to know if he's a man fully to be trusted——"

"With untold wealth?"

"No, to see a ghost."

"Ah! I see!"

"You're brave too, aren't you, Mr. Wolcott?"

"You're very kind to say so, but I assure you there never was a worse coward than I am. I've no courage at all—I'm all brain! Now there's the difference between Mr. Steele and myself."

Mable rose. "Yes, I see the difference," she said. "I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Wolcott, for your good advice. I wasn't sure whether he would undertake it. Brain is a good thing, so is courage; I prefer a happy mixture." And with a pleasant little nod she sailed off.

I never saw until afterwards what a comparison I had made—one all courage and no brain, and the other all brain and no courage. I had muddled things badly, that was evident, and the worst of it was that she never gave me an opportunity to let her know I had not intended any disrespect to her future liege.

All this time Sol. Humphreys never ceased talking about buying the large house. At last Mabel made the proposition that some night we three, Ned, Butter-Scotch and myself, should go there and stay until morning, and if our report was "no ghosts," she would not say any more against the purchasing scheme; but if anything diabolical or mysterious happened, that her father was to give up the idea. Our consent being asked, we cheerfully gave it, and as one time was as good as another, we decided to make the experiment that night.

Armed each with a stout stick and a pillow, we advanced upon the haunted dwelling about nine o'clock, and were admitted by the man in charge, whose headquarters were in an adjoining building, which communicated with the house by a long entry at the end of which was an iron door. This door was closed and bolted after us, and we were left to make our own way.

I, for one, did not expect to see anything supernatural, but Mabel's stories were very vivid, and I would have liked to obliged her by seeing something uncanny. We had brought a lantern with us, and Butter-Scotch had very self-sacrificingly taken charge of it. So we ascended the stairs, and made a tour of the upper floors, then descended, and made another tour of the ground floor and cellar, and Butter-Scotch considered, the exploration so thorough that he strongly advocated going home and to bed, and bringing in a sealed verdict, "no ghosts." But we wouldn't hear of it. So, having made sure that the front door was unlocked on the inside, and could be opened instantaneously if the proposed ghost were disposed to be violent, or use language unfit for "ears polite," we made ourselves as comfortable in the hall as circumstances of no bed and an indefinite ghost would allow.

"Oh, no; I was thinking how——"

"Great Heavens!" whispered Butter-Scotch.

"Where? where?" we asked simultaneously.

"I thought you saw something," Ned said to him, irritably.

"He went in my eye. Probably you'd cry out if a beetle went in your eye."

"That's all right, Scotchy. You're game, eh, old man?"

"This is sheer nonsense," Mr. Steele explained.

Whirr-rr-rr fizz, thupp!

Butter-Scotch yelled, and started up.

"Sit down. Don't you know a June beetle when you hear one."

"Was it, indeed?" and Butter-Scotch wiped his forehead.

Suddenly there was a crash somewhere in the house.

"By George!" gasped Ned, "we're in for it, boys."

I don't know how long we waited, but it began again—first a sneeze, then a hissing sound, then a pail rolling down stairs, followed by an assortment of dust-pans and fire-irons.

This was first-class. After the storm ceased Butter-Scotch, in a committee of one, proposed that we should alter the verdict to "ghosts emphatically," and go home. "It was entertaining, but to tell the truth, he was sleepy.

In a few minutes there was another crash, and we saw something white on the stairs, slowly and solemnly approaching. As it neared the bottom it raised an arm; a low moan came from it, and a rasping sound of a by no means cheerful character.

Butter-Scotch made for the door, and in his excitement pushed against it instead of pulling, so he could get out. The ghost, seeing our fright, uttered a shriek, and came swiftly towards us.

This was too much for flesh and blood to bear, and Butter-Scotch yelled "Murder! thieves! fire!" frantic with horror, and we all three pulled and pushed, beside ourselves with fear.

Just as the ghost nearly reached us, Ned pulled the door open, and there was a crash and a rush, and before I knew what had happened the door was shut with a bang, and I was left in darkness in the hall, with the knowledge that the ghost was there it could touch me if it wanted to. A second of silence, and then a voice hissed, "Cowards!" I indorsed that opinion heartily, but the others were greater cowards than I was; I wouldn't have kicked the light out of the lantern, or shut the door on them.

There was a yawn, and then the thing said, "Oh, my!"

I plucked up my spirits a little. The ghost had sense enough to be sleepy, and I thought I could stand a a little talk, if it would only keep hands off. Possibly it wanted to find the door, for it came straight towards me. But the knob wasn't where the phantom thought it ought to be, and the seeking hand rested for about two seconds on my nose. The touch gave me courage; it was warm, soft, and pleasant as a woman's. I stretched out my arms, and grasped the phantom. It shrieked and started, but I was strong, and the ghost was solid, so it didn't get away. I didn't feel afraid of it then; on the contrary, it seemed afraid of me.

"Dear ghost, sweet ghost," I said, "I won't hurt you."

The answer came tremblingly and low: "What are you saying! Who sent you?"

"Why, my darling ghost," I said, "the lady that's going to be Mrs. Butter-Scotch."

"How do you know she is?"

"Oh, I know well enough. You are a smart ghost not to know that!"

"She doesn't love him."

"Oh yes, she does. My sweet little phantom, you are entirely mistaken. Come, I'll see if I can't light the lantern, if that insane booby hasn't smashed it all to pieces in getting out."

"Let me go, please," the ghost begged, in a very polite manner; and as it spoke the words sounded to me very much as from a human voice disguised, and yet I couldn't see for the life of me how anything human could have got into the house after we came in, or how anything human could have made such an everlasting row, and rattled its bones so unpleasantly. But the ghost's hands had flesh on them. My curiosity was aroused, so I said, "No, I can't let you go."

"It's wrong hugging me when you love another."

"Whom do I love?"

"Mrs. Butter-Scotch, of course. I know all about it."

"You do, eh? Then I suppose you know how it all happened?"

"Yes, of course I do."

"Do you know why I stopped?"

"Because you hadn't money enough to ask her to marry you."

"You're perfectly right, my dear little ghost; but neither you nor I know whether she'd have married me even if I happened to have plenty of money. I wish you'd tell me that."

"I won't do anything of the kind. I'm perfectly surprised at myself for talking to a mortal so long. Good bye man. Go back to the Humphreys, and tell them what you have seen. If the old man buys this house, won't I make it hot for him! Good bye, mortal."

But I would not let go of the ghost's arm.

"Please let me go now," the phantom beseeched.

A bright idea came to me. I said: "Can I trust you? Is a ghost's word good for anything?"

With great dignity it answered: "Yes; I never lie."

"All right. If you'll promise to meet me to-morrow evening under the old apple tree on Mr. Humphreys' place at ten o'clock, I'll let you go." And as I released my hold the ghost seemed to vanish away, and I opened the door and went out. My senses were dazed in the open air; the evening had been so strange, so almost auspicious, that I could not fathom it all at once. Besides, I had allowed the ghost to go before it had given the promise to meet me again. I remembered my stupidity with regret, but somehow I felt the ghost would consider the promise as having been given, and be at the trysting-place. At the house they had given me up for lost, and were discussing all manner of plans for my rescue, and Ned was on the point of coming for me alone, as Mr. Steele could not be persuaded to enter that house again until daylight. However the thing was settled, and Mr. Humphreys accepted our report unquestionably, but with great regret, and the next morning Mabel was informed of the result. At last the evening came, and we were in the porch. Mabel had retired with a headache, and the rest of us smoked our cigars and followed our own thoughts in silence. As it neared ten, I arose leisurely, and strolled off to the old apple tree. I had been there but a few minutes when I saw a white figure approaching as if from the adjoining place, and it came straight to me and stopped at my side.

I lifted my hat. "Good evening," I said.

The phantom responded with a neat little ghostly courtesy. "Mortal, I never tell a lie," it said.

"Will you shake hands? Truly a ghost's word can be believed."

The phantom gave me its hand, but after I had held it a decent length of time, tried to regain possession of it.

"Does the old gentleman believe?" asked the ghost.

"Yes; it's all right—he won't buy the house now. You can remain alone in it in undisturbed possession."

"I don't want to stay alone in it."

"Well, my sweet phantom, I don't see how you're going to arrange it. Haven't you got any relatives to come and help you be gay?"

"No, none."

"That's bad. I know the dust-pan and fire-iron business is jolly, and then it does sound awfully cheerful to have pails rolling down stairs; but its like playing billiards—gets monotonous if you haven't any one to play with."

The ghost sighed.

"What's that for?" I inquired. Don't you like being a ghost?"

"No, not a bit."

"Dear me! Would you like to be an ordinary mortal person?"

"Yes."

"My! And get married?"

"Yes, I think so—I don't know."

"Well, I'm very fond of you, dear little ghost."

"I don't believe you. You're fond of somebody else."

"Well, well; you told me that before, and I don't deny it; but, my sweet little phantom, she don't care two cents for me now."

"How do you know?"

"Oh, I know it very well."

"You're wrong. Why don't you go and ask her?"

"I'm not going to insult her."

"Do you call that an insult?"

"Yes—from one in my position. Sweet ghost," I said coming nearer, "let's make believe you're my angel!" putting my arms around her, and drawing her to me.

"Then you don't love her?"

"On the contrary, it's because I love her so much that I want to make believe you're Miss Mabel."

The ghost submitted with a good grace, but forgot her assumed ghostliness. "James!" she said, and the voice carried me back two years, and my darling was revealed to me.

"Mabel, Mabel," I said, "what is this? Does it mean you love me!"

"Yes."

"But why did you play such a prank on us all?"

"I knew you still loved me, but would never say so, and, besides, I wanted a little fun."

"Bless you, it was fun, but you might have been hurt."

"Oh, no." she laughed; "I wasn't afraid. The others were so brave, and you were such a coward—all brain and no courage, you know."

A month later I was a clerk on a good salary, and six months later Mabel and I were married. But the secret of our wooing in the large house and under the apple tree was never told, and from that time forth I had no fear of ghosts—my own particular, precious little ghost was my shield and protection.

Didn't Appreciate the Opportunity.

"What a chance for you," said a friend to one of our bonanza princes, just completing his new house. "What a chance to buy some fine paintings. Blank, the broker, has collapsed, and is selling his collection." "You're very kind in your intentions, I am sure," said the bonanza, "but my wife wouldn't care to buy second hand paintings."—San Francisco Examiner.

Log Cabin Logic.

Brawn and Brain!

The powerful engine, with its wonderful propelling power, coupled to the long train full freighted with the richest fabrics of the intellectual looms of the centuries—what obstacles can stay the progress of this mighty force, when once under full steam along life's highway?

The American with brawn and brain does not see the necessity for titles of nobility, does not care for elevation by descent, he can reach out and pluck the stars.

But with brawn or brain impaired, a man is badly handicapped in the mad race for success which is the marked characteristic of the present age.

The physical system is a most intricate piece of machinery. It ought to be kept well regulated, so that it will work harmoniously in all its parts, then it is capable of an immense amount of work.

It is said that a watch, if expected to keep perfect time, must be wound daily. It will not keep good time unless it "runs regular." More men break down because they don't "run regular" than for any other reason.

It is claimed by physicians that few men are killed by hard work. It is to the irregularities of modern social life that the high death rate is due. Men burn their candle at both ends, then wonder why it burns out so quickly.

The main thing in keeping the human machine in good working order is to keep the regulator all right. "The blood is the life," and sound health is assured so long as the blood flows through the veins a limpid stream of purity.

Regulate the regulator with Warner's Log Cabin sarsaparilla, the old fashioned blood purifier, prepared after the best formula in use by our ancestors in good old Log cabin days, and with the vigor of brawn and brain which must ensue, in your life's lexicom you will find no such a word as fail.

Had the Car all to Himself.

From the Louisville Post.

A gentleman just up from a trip through the South tells a joke which rests on yellow fever as a humorous basis. He was whirling along in a railroad car through a strip of country near Birmingham. The coach was crowded with passengers all quarantined against stopping at any town, and all glad to get out of the stricken regions. Of course in that clime, where Yellow Jack has uncrowned King Cotton to rule pro tem, on his throne, everybody is suspicious of everybody else on the grounds of self-preservation. So in the car every traveler looked askance at every other passenger and edged off from him as far as the contracted seats would allow. Suddenly a bilious-looking duck sprang from a window, hoisted the sash in a jiffy, poked his head out, and was apparently throwing up his immortal soul. At the first heave he made the passengers in the wildest alarm, supposing he had the fever, make for the door. In a few minutes the car was deserted and the sick man rode alone. It turned out that he had only been made seasick by the swaying motion of the cars. For a hundred miles the coach he rode in was as much his own as if he owned it. No one dared to enter it.

The surplus in the national treasury on Oct 11th was a few dollars in excess of $90,000,000. When the $16,000,000 of bonds which have been purchased within the past few days are presented for payment the surplus will not be over $76,000,000. From compilations made at the capitol and at the treasury department the estimated receipts of the government for the present fiscal year are only $18,000,000 in excess of the appropriations already made by this congress. Thus it appears that with the present surplus of $76,000,000, to which the estimated $18,000,000 anticipated surplus in excess of present appropriations should be added, will make a total of $94,000,000 as the probable surplus at the end of the present fiscal year. A halt in the purchase of the government bonds, now that the sinking fund for the year is filled, is practically called, and bond purchases will not in the next few months likely exceed a few millions a month.

BEFORE IT IS BORN.

Some Startling Statement of General Interest.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, on being asked when the training of a child should begin, replied, "A hundred years before it is born."

Are we to infer from this that this generation is responsible for the condition of the race a hundred years from now?

It is conceded in other lands that most of the wonderful discoveries of the world in this century have come from this country. Our ancestors were reared in log cabins, and suffered hardships and trials.

But they lived and enjoyed health to a ripe old age. The women of those days would endure hardships without apparent fatigue that would startle those of the present age.

Why was it?

One of the proprietors of the popular remedy known as Warner's safe cure, has been faithfully investigating the cause, and has called to his aid scientists as well as medical men, impressing upon them the fact that there cannot be an effect without a cause. This investigation disclosed the fact that in the olden times simple remedies were administered, compounded of herbs and roots, which were gathered and stored in the lofts of the log cabins, and when sickness came on, these remedies from nature's laboratory were used with the best effects.

What were these remedies? What were they used for? After untiring and diligent search they have obtained the formulas so generally used for various disorders.

Now the question is, how will the olden time preparations affect the people of this age, who have been treated, under modern medical schools and codes, with poisonous and injurious drugs. This test has been carefully pursued, until they are convinced that the preparations they now call Warner's Log Cabin remedies are what our much abused systems require.

Among them is what is known as Warner's Log Cabin sarsaparilla, and they frankly announce that they do not consider the sarsaparilla of so much value in itself as it is in the combination of the various ingredients which together work marvelously upon the system. They also have preparations for other diseases, such as "Warner's Log Cabin cough and consumption remedy," "Log Cabin hops and buchu remedy," "Warner's Log Cabin hair tonic." They have great confidence that they have a cure for the common disease of catarrh, which they give the name of "Log Cabin rose cream." Also a "Log Cabin plaster," which they are confident will supplant all others, and a liver pill, to be used separately or in connection with the other remedies.

We hope that the public will not be disappointed in these remedies, but will reap a benefit from the investigations, and that the proprietors will not be embarrassed in their introduction by dealers trying to substitute remedies that have been so familiar to the shelves of our druggists. This line of remedies will be used instead of others. Insist upon your druggist getting them for you if he hasn't them yet in stock, and we feel confident that these new remedies will receive approbation at our reader's hands, as the founders have used every care in their preparation.

Remembering a Friend in Need.

An Erie (Penn.) dispatch, says: "Half a dozen years ago Conrad Shenfield staggered on the stage at the Opera-House, at a Murphy temperance meeting, and signed the pledge. He kept it, but his fortune was gone. He had been cast out by his friends and he was penniless. He went to Colonel Charles M. Lynch, then a prosperous lawyer, and secured a loan of $200 and went west. Fortune favored Shenfield, and when he died recently in Kansas City he left, in city lots, Western lands and railroad stocks, in Albuquerque, New Mexico, about $150,000 worth of property. His will was recorded, and, while it cut off his relations with nominal bequests, the remainder of the estate was willed to Colonel Lynch in token of his gratitude for help when in need. Colonel Lynch had been in hard luck of late."

Do not allow silly campaign lies to affect you. Vote the straight republican ticket. It is composed of worthy men.

Advices from New York and Indiana indicate that these two great pivotal states will go for Harrison and Morton by good majorities.

From everywhere comes cheering reports of republican gains and republican enthsiasm. A corresponding gloom is apparent in the democratic camp.

It is a business matter whether voters elect Harrison or Cleveland. The success of Harrison means a feast of plenty, of Cleveland a feast of cheapness and poverty.

Canning stock, never quoted very high in this market, is way below par, and will be a drug on the market by election day.

Com-stock is quoted away above par and will be top of the heap election day.

E. G. Holmes seems to be having everything his own way in his legislative district for the senate. The democrats nominated R. L. Frazee, but for some reason Frazee so far has not accepted. At this rate it will be a walk away for E. G.

The democratic organs loudly proclaim that boodle nominated W. R. Merriam. It was the counties outside of Ramsey and Hennepin,—the farmers that nominated him. How do the farmers enjoy being accused of selling their votes in this wholesale manner?

Harrison and Morton are receiving strong aid from Anna Dickinson's speeches—so strong in fact that the opposition winces and is denouncing Miss Dickinson. But Miss Dickinson doesn't mind. This isn't the first time the democratic party has denounced her.

From now until the polls close every republican should see that he makes every day count. It is not necessary to go out electioneering in order to help our splendid ticket. Try to think of someone whom you can perhaps influence in the right direction and make it your duty to see him.

A few more days and the destiny of the country for four years will be settled. Shall it be in favor of Americans and American labor, or shall it be in favor of free trade and English labor? The verdict lies in the hands of the American people and now looks like it would be favorable to American labor.

It must be that there are one or two honorable, upright gentlemen on the republican ticket, but the democrats don't discriminate. They fill the air with reports of rascality against all alike. In their desperation they largely overdo the matter, for it is unreasonable to suppose that every man on our ticket is a blackleg. Yet if you believe democratic stories you must believe this, as they make no exceptions.

Everywhere that Mr. Comstock goes he is making friends, because the real intrinsic worth of the man is seen and recognized by every truly honest man. If his manner before the people is not enough to convince them of his worth, his public record, which is an open book is, and all one has to do to be convinced is to search that record. The more searchingly this is done by an honest man the more plainly is the fact revealed that a better, more honest or abler man than Hon. S. G. Comstock does not exist in the district.

General Harrison's definition of the Mills bill as a measure intended to detach the agricultural voters from the protective column describes it exactly. But unfortunately for the success of Mr. Mills' scheme the northern and western farmers feel very much at home in the protective ranks and as much interested in the maintenance of the protective cause as anybody. The old ante-bellum southern idea that the tariff benefits New England at the expense of the agricultural portion of the country, is only heard from the cheapest kind of demagogues nowadays.

High license seems to be productive of good fruits in Minnesota. There were 2,806 saloons. These are reduced to 1,596—a reduction of 1,200, or nearly one-half. There is also a decrease in the consumption of liquor in nearly every county. The liquor business is more amenable to the law, and is under better police supervision. The low groggeries, which, besides breeding drunkenness, breed also lawlessness, are broken up. The former average license cost $300, and now, under high license, the average is $650, while the annual revenue is raised from $850,000 to $1,100,060.

When you have been reading democratic editorials (?) on republican candidates, did it never strike you as peculiar, that among the whole list there is to be found, according to democratic logic? But such is the case. They say from Harrison down every one is a "thief," a "liar," a "boodler" or something bad. Is it not singular that one party should happen to make such a mistake as to put up ALL unworthy men and the other to put up ALL true and worthy men? If we believe what the democrats say, we must accept this as true. But does not the unreasonableness of such a statement suggest that in their efforts to down the republican party the democrats are extremely reckless in their statements. If this is so—and it is, how can one believe anything they say?

Vote It Straight.

The republican ticket is composed of the best men in the country, a ticket well worthy the hearty support of every honest and true man. The principles of the republican party are incomparable, so there is no earthly sense for any man to leave that party this fall if the best men and the best government is what he seeks. Vote the straight republican ticket.

Democratic Policy.

In this district the democrats have paid no attention to the fitness of their candidates for office, the only thing worthy of consideration to them being: "Is he likely to win?" They put up Mr. Canning, against the better judgment of many of their best men, simply and solely because they thought Mr. Canning controls the farmers' vote and they knew that the farmers' vote is all powerful in the district. We do not believe in the democratic method of calling everybody a thief and a dishonest rascal because he don't happen to agree with us on every point, so we do not say Mr. Canning is not an honest man. What we do claim is that the interests of this great district requires something more than honesty—it must have legislative ability as well. The democrats harp upon Mr. Canning's "honesty," but we have yet to hear the first one claim for him any marked (or even average) ability as a legislator. The only point they considered was availability. "Will he draw votes?" They thought he would, so they nominated him. So with every other place, all they ask, all they are anxious to know is: "Can he be elected?" That may be good policy for a party to elect their ticket on, but it is fearfully bad policy for the country.

Fergus Falls welcomed our next governor, W. R. Merriam, in right royal manner on Thursday evening, Oct. 11th. It is estimated that over 600 torches were in line and the enthusiasm was immense. The large court house was filled to suffocation to listen to the eloquence of M. E. Clapp, Esq., and many were unable to get in because of the crowd. Mr. Merriam gave a brief and forcible address, and by his social and hearty manner made many friends in Fergus. His reception at Pelican Rapids on Friday night and at Henning on Saturday were repetitions of the ovation at Fergus. Everywhere he goes it is the same.

Norman County Index: It is said that Fletcher and his crowd, who usually have been able to run republican state conventions are greatly dissatisfied at the victory of the farmers in the last state convention, and they are doing nothing for Merriam. This is a good reason for farmers to rally enthusiastically to Merriam's support. Show the late republican bosses that you can get along without their aid and a great victory is won. By giving Merriam a big vote you also cast a vote against the democratic "bosses," Hill, Kelly and Doran. A vote for Merriam means a vote against the "bossism" in both parties.

Marshall County Leader: Let every republican voter look to it that he posts himself on the character of the two men running for congress in this district. In no district in the union do the people need to scan the character of their candidate as in this fifth Minnesota, for the member of congress who represents us has far more to do than any other representative. Our population is more than twice greater than that of any other, and owing to the number of Indian reservations, custom houses, new postal routes etc. to be looked after, the actual work to be done is three times greater than that of any othes representative, with the single exception of the Dakota delegate. The republican candidate for congress, the Hon. S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, is a man of great legislative experience, having served many years in the state legislature. He is a thorough going business man, of the highest character, and integrity, a natural born American, with no tinge of demagoguery and a man of the highest attainments possible for such a position. The democratic candidate is well known as a blatherskite, a natural demagogue, who, for the sake of office would be a democrat with democrats, a republican with republicans, an anti-monopolist with the farmers, anything to get votes. He has shouted against the railroads and elevator companies and then turned right around and worked with them, and has shown himself, politically, to be a hypocritical, poorly balanced demagogue. A man like Chas. Canning will never do the people any good in our legislative halls, and no one knows it better than our democratic railroad kings and monopolists. Such a man naturally becomes a servile tool in the hands of those who have money to spend to control the course of legislation. There are hundreds of honest democrats who are disgusted with his nomination, and many of them say openly that they shall vote for Mr. Comstock, and help to secure his election. Farmers of Marshall County, if you wish to have this district well represented in congress, you must vote for Comstock.

It is a hopeful sign in American politics when a presidential candidate is able to go through a campaign in so clean a manner as has Gen. Harrison. If he is never president, our candidate has in this performed a service of great value to American public life.

Levi P. Morton has given great assistance to the campaign. First, his name was a terror of strength in the pivotal state, and second, his knowledge of men and measures has been valuable.

The democratic prating about supplying the markets of the world is about as silly as the theory that we should endeavor to cheapen our products. England sells abroad only what it cannot sell at home. If it had a home market for all its products it would have no desire for a foreign market, because the former is in every respect the most desirable. The fact that a home market is independent makes it best, and it would be the sheerest folly for us to send our goods to uncertain markets abroad when we are buying $700,000,000 worth of goods yearly. Better increase than decrease our tariff, and thus offer inducements for more industries, than to depress what we have through a tariff that would make us purchasers from abroad in double that amount. The issue of the day, when divested of all extraneous vestments, is, whether it is better it is better to buy abroad than to manufacture at home.

The great surplus exists, in part, because this same Administration made rulings in favor of foreign importers, and against American producers, and so encouraged the heaviest imports ever known. This home thrust is made by the Boston Journal. Honest enforcement of existing law would have shut out goods costing many millions, defending American working-men from excessive competition, and at the same time lessening the revenue paid into the treasury. The same administration vetoed, or by its influence defeated acts of congress, which would have expended some of the excessive revenue in public improvements, in public education, in providing a better foreign and domestic mail service, and in caring for disabled Union veterans. Now the excessive surplus is used to feed the flames of speculation, and meanwhile the people pay more for their bread.

The Profits of Labor--Where the Benefit of Protection Goes.

It is the democratic contention that only the manufacturer gets the benefit of the tariff. Hon. Thomas McDougall, in Avondale (says the Cincinnati Times-Star) hurled at the democratic position some bombs of fact which completely destroy the fabric of error erected by theorists. Mr. McDougall was once a laborer in free trade Great Britain, and when he speaks on the practical operation of the tariff, as it affects the interests of labor, he speaks by the card. He says:

"My employer in Leith paid me as a skilled mechanic, for working on building engines and other machinery, the sum of $5 per week. My employer in Cincinnati paid me for the same kind of work, and the same amount of work, $15 per week. Who got the $10 per week? Certainly not my employer. I did. Now, my employer in Scotland made, I know, larger profits on the capital he had invested than did my employer in Cincinnati on his capital. Both were Scotchmen; both were good mechanics; both were hard working men. Who got the benefit of the tariff levied to protect my Cincinnati employer in his business against the same work done by my employer in Leith, Scotland? The mechanics. I know it did not go into the pocket of my Cincinnati employer. Had there been no protective tariff my Scotch employer whould have driven my Cincinnati employer out of the business of engine building and I might have been still working in Scotland for $5 per week. Four-fifths of the cost of every engine, lathe, machine of any kind or description, from the time the iron leaves the ground as ore until it stands a finished machine ready for work, is paid to labor, to the mechanics engaged in the making of the machine. As the employer does not receive more in this country than a fair return on his capital invested; as he does not receive as much, as a rule, as the employer in free trade England does, necessarily the purchaser of the machine in paying its price pays four-fifths of that price to the mechanics who are engaged in its construction. And here is the vital point regarding a revision of the tariff. Any reduction of the tax is at a point that simply enables the manufacturer to make a legitimate profit, necessarily involves a reduction of the wages of the mechanic."

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

HARRISON ON TEMPERANCE.

The Republican Candidate Taking Advanced Ground on this Question.

But he takes Careful and Legal Ground—and does it When no Campaign is on, Because he Favors the Home as Against the Saloon.

HARRISON ON TEMPERANCE.

The following is an extract from an addres delivered by General Benjamin Harrison, the republican candidate for president, to his Indiana friends and neighbors at Danville, on November 26th of last year.

On the great question of temperance General Harrison said:

"Another question that I want to talk about for a little while, is what I will still call the temperance question, though I notice that a distinguished bishop of the Methodist church south said the other day that down his way they had got past temperance, and refused to appoint any conference committee on temperance, because they had got by that. When you get past temperance beware of intemperance yourself. I believe there is an authority which all our Methodist brethren recognize, as well as we Presbyterians, to the effect that we should be 'temperate in all things.' The apostle had not got past thmperance.

Now what is this temperance or liquor question? Primarily, to me, it is a question that takes on a bold aspect. It is the question of the absolute, universal obedience to law, as law, by everybody. That is the first and broadest statement of it. I say, absolute, universal obedience to law, as, law without any reference to what I think or you think about the law.

PUBLIC ORDER IN PERIL.

And yet, when that very issue is made, as it was made in our last Indianapolis campaign, when good citicens are standing for law and order, irrespective of party, are combining to defeat the insolent attempt of the liquor league to dominate our city politics, and to re-elect a man as mayor who had the courage to put work-house sentences upon these liquor sellers when they persistently violated the law, we found some gentlemen of the sort who had got past temperance voting an independent ticket, and so helping, indirectly, to elect a man who would have given a loose rein to lawlessness.

Thank God, there were not enough of them to succeed! I don't impute this as the purpose at all of any of them; but nevertheless the effect of withdrawing from this column of the law and order people some votes that might have been necessary to prevent the triumph of lawlessness, was to put the cause of public order in peril. My countrymen! I believe that the question of enforcing the laws is assuming an importance now that it has never had before in our country. We have been careless, thoughtless, as we saw violations of the law going on from day to day; but the nation has been startled into a realization of the fact that its only safety, the only anchor it has out on the side of social order and domestic peace, is the enforcement of the law.

OBEDIENCE TO LAW.

What was it that culminated at Chicago less than two years ago, on that day when the guardians of the law were butchered? Where did this red flower find its seed? It was, as I believe, in that defiant, persistent violation of law upon which we have so long looked indifferently. The nation is waking up. My first proposition on the temperance question is, that so long as the law is as it is, whether you like it or I like it, we shall still stand together and declare that the law shall be enforced.

Now, I know there are some people—who seem to me to be greatly misguided—who say we don't care about the law being enforced; we would rather have free whisky than taxed whisky; we would rather the sale should be open and unrestrained; would rather that the violations of order might be increased and multiplied, because thereby we hope to awaken the people to a fuller realization of the evil of this thing, and thus secure State prohibition. I hope no friend here takes that ground. If you do, you find yourself in bad company, and evil consequences following hard after you.

A FIRST-CLASS START.

Stand, rather, as all good men must stand, for the rigid enforcement, without fear or favor, of every statute upon the statute books. That is a good start. And when this principle is well established, and you stand with us now for it, we will stand with you when you get a law that suits you better, and you will have a sentiment that will back it up; but if you don't stand with us now, but encourage in any way, directly or indirectly, the spirit of lawlessness, to what will you appeal when you get the law you want?

I want to say this further: There may have been a time in the past when the republican party of Indiana had dalliance with the liquor interests; but I beg to say to all who hear me to-day, that when the platform of the last State convention was read and received with cheers by the great masses who heard it, any dalliance between the republican party and the liquor league was severed once and forever. When the resolution fell from the lips of the chairman of the committee on resolutions, a trumpet was sounded that will never call retreat.

LIQUOR DEFYING THE LAW.

Why? Simply for the reason I have already given; the liquor league is an organization framed to defy the law, and, therefore, we are against it, and it is against us. And yet, notwithstanding this, and notwithstanding the fact that whenever you open the rope in which the democratic party masquerades, you see some liquor league boodle sticking out, there are those who, like my friend, the Methodist bishop, south, have got "past temperance," and are third party men who make the welkin ring with the cry: 'Smash the republican party!' Well, that is not a cry likely to draw republicans into your party.

Before me to-day is a great body of republicans, young and old, full of pride in the old party, who believe that it has, under God, wrought out the best things that were ever achieved by any political organization; who believe that it has in it yet high capacities, and who are not amiably disposed when anybody says, 'Smash the republican party?' If you want to persuade us, you will have to change that cry. And what next? Why do you want to smash the republican party? Does the shield it carries cover the liquor league? No, my countrymen! Now, henceforth, if not before, the shield it carries fronts the liquor league, and the point of its spear is toward that enemy of law and order.

WHERE THE FUSION IS.

Why is it that we do not hear from our prohibition friends the cry, 'Smash the democratic party'? Why is it, when the campaign is on, that the democratic party newspapers becomes at the same time a liquor league and a third party organ? Simply because they hope thus to withdraw from the republican party, by this third party movement, enough votes to continue the liquor league and the democratic party in power. They will have the spoils of office, and their shield will faithfully cover these violaters of the law.

I have said before, and I say now, that among this band of zealous third party workers for prohibition there are devoted, faithful, earnest men and women. But, my friends, is it not a little hard when the republican party has sounded this note of defiance, and boldly confronts this organized traffic that you affect so much to reprobate, and the democratic party allied with it, that we should hear the hoarse cry of the liquor league in our front, 'smash the republican party!' and from the rear should come also the piping cry of the third party prohibitionists, answering like an echo to the hoarse cry in our front, 'smash the republican party'?"

Senator Harrison—"No, they won't! Because, for one reason, the great body of that great pioneer church of the west, that paved the way for civilization and God in our woods, are unlike the bishop down south, and have not 'got past temperance.'

WHAT TO DO ABOUT IT.

"What are we going to do about it? Well, let us see. We said in our state platform that we were in favor of clothing local communities with power to act upon this question. There I stand for one day. I do not beleive in state prohibition as the best method of dealing with this question. If you do, there is no reason why we should part to-day. There is good work that we can do together. The republican party in the house of representatives, so far as it could, kept the pledge of the platform. If you had helped us, my prohibition friends, to make the senate republican, that law would have been on the statute book to-day.

I believe it is true, and can be demonstrated to be true that if you had thrown your votes with us in the last campaign such a result could have been accomplished. Is it not worth while to work together? I believe that much depends upon the wise and thoughtful reconsideration of all these questions by the temperance people of Indiana, and if they shall wisely think upon them and wisely give their vote and influence to the party that has started boldly in the direction of temperance reform, we shall certainly carry Indiana next year and greatly advance the good cause of temperance reform."

	H	OME. ONESTY. APPINESS. ARRISON.
HARRIS- MORT- PROTECTI- UNI-	ON	TO VICTORY. IN NOVEMBER.

Whiskey in the Mills Bill.

Erie Dispatch: Some of the democratic papers are denying the statement that the Mills bill proposes to remove all federal burdens from the retail liquor business and make saloon keeping free throughout the land, so far as the general government is concerned. If they will turn to the bill in question and look at the fortieth section thereof they will find it to read as follows:

"That all clauses of section 3,244 of the revised statutes, and all laws amendatory thereof, and and all other laws which impose any special taxe upon manufacturers of stills, retail dealers in liquors and retailers in malt liquors are hereby repealed."

How does this strike the prohibitionists who are laboring so fearlessly and industriously to keep free whisky democracy in power?

Democratic Consistencies.

Santa Barbara, (Cal.,) Press: The following are a few of the inconsistencies found in the arguments advanced by our democratic friends:

'Our manufacturers are monopolists and thieves; they make all the money and rob the farmer and wage-earner.

Our manufacturers cannot compete with foreigners, because they must pay too much for raw materials (farm products) and wages.

Our poor workingmen are living in hovels and starving to death because the robber manufacturer does not pay them enough wages.

Our workingmen are too independent in this country because the high wages make them so; they strike, whenever they have an advantage, for more wages.

The war was a failure; Lincoln and Grant were butchers.

The war was a success; Lincoln and Grant are the greatest and best men that ever lived.

Of course our democratic friends do not use all these asertions at one time or one place, but are discreet enough to apply them in a manner that is calculated to make votes.

Poor Old Herald.

Hartford Post: The New York Herald has been badly sold by a raving democratic free trader in Bridgeport, who sent it a long list of manufacturers who were alleged to be in favor of free trade; nearly every one of them has contradicted the report and state that they are in favor of protection and will support Harrison and Morton. The democratic free traders are in a bad way.

Synopsis of Proposed Constitutional Amendments, prepared By the Attorney General, pursuant to Chapter 157, of General Laws of 1887.

The Legislature of 1887 provided for submitting certain amendments to the State Constitution, to be submitted at the general election to be held in 1888.

The proposed amendments to the provisions of the Constitution to be affected thereby are as follows:

Chapter 1, of the General Laws of 1887, provides that the following amendment to Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that the said article be amended by adding thereto the following additional section, to be numbered as Section 35: "Sec. 35. Any combination of persons, either as individuals or as members or officers of any corporation to monopolize the markets for food products in this State, or to interfere with or restrict the freedom of such markets is hereby declared to be a criminal conspiracy, and shall be punished in such manner as the Legislature shall provide."

The ballots to be used in voting upon this Amendment shall be as follows: First, ballots in favor of the amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to freedom of markets—Yes." Second, ballots used against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to the freedom of markets—No."

Article 4 of the Constitution, of which the above section is proposed as an amendment comprises the constitutional provisions relating to the legislative department of the State, and at present contains no provision relating to combinations sought to be prohibited by the proposed amendment.

Section 12 or Article 1 of the State Constitution now reads as follows: "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in this State, and this shall not prevent the Legislature from providing for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt, and a reasonable amount of property shall be exempt from seizure and sale for the payment of any debt or liability. The amount of such exemption shall be determined by law."

It is proposed to amend this as follows: Chapter 2 of the General Laws of 1887 provides that the following amendment to Section 12 of Article 1, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the voters of this State at the next general election, to-wit: "Provided, however, that all property so exempted shall be liable to seizure and sale for any debts incurred to any person for work done or material furnished in the construction, repair or improvement of the same, And, provided farther, that such liability to seizure and sale shall also extend to all real property for any debt incurred to any laborer or servant for labor or service performed.

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed, or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to Section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State for protection of the rights of working men or women—Yes." The ballots to be used in voting against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to Section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State, for protection of the rights of working men or women—No."

The effect of this amendment will be to render all property liable for debts incurred for work done or materials furnished in the construction, improvement or repair of such property.

Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, now reads as follows: Section 1, Legislature, Session. The Legislature of the State shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives and shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law, and no session shall exceed the term of sixty days."

It is proposed to amend this section as follows: Chapter 3 of the General Laws of the State of Minnesota of 1887, provides that the following amendment to Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that said section shall be amended so as to read as follows: "Section 1. The Legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety legislative days, and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the Governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the Legislature shall be called to some matter of general interest by a special message of the Governor."

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—Yes," and ballots to be used in voting against said amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—No."

The Constitution at present provides for biennial sessions, and the effect of this last amendment will be to continue biennial sessions, but instead of such sessions being limited to sixty days, as they are now, they would be limited to ninety days, and no bill could be introduced during the last twenty days except as provided for in such amendment

Attorney General.

Honest and Just.

Some time ago a certain Fifth district farmer wrote to Knute Nelson in regard to the congressional contest and the following reply was received:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.
Washington, Sept. 24, 1888.

Dear Sir: Yours of the 17th has just reached me here at Alexandria. I have nothing to say against Mr. Canning as a man or a democrat. But I think there is no excuse or occasion for any republican to oppose Mr. Comstock. I have known him well and intimately since 1875 and have found him always honest, able and reliable. We have no better nor abler man in our district. There is nothing but mere politics in the hue and cry that he is a railroad man. The same cry was made against me when I first ran. But I think no respectable man can now be found who will say I have been the tool of the railroads. On all questions between the public and the railways I have always been on the side of the public, and I feel certain—as certain as I would be of myself—that Mr. Comstock will under all circumstances be on the side of the public, and that no railroad can use him for any unjust or improper purpose. Mr. Comstock is one of those men who are constitutionally and organically honest and just, and a man so constituted is always safe and can always be depended upon. Yours truly,

KNUTE NELSON.

"Turn the Rascals Out."

The most scandalous disregard of the public interest has been exhibited by Cleveland's secretary of the treasury in the administration of the affairs of that department (says the San Francisco Chronicle.) There is now loaned to pet national banks, under the pretense of relieving the stringency in the money market—which, by the way, has not existed except in the imagination of Cleveland—a sum of about $60,000,000. On this vast amount not one cent of interest is paid to the government; but, on the contrary, the borrowers are paid interest on the securities deposited to guarantee the loan. The trick is a neat one. It makes solid friends, who will put up what is vulgarly termed "boodle," to secure the re-election of Grover Cleveland.

WM. R. MERRIAM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives, Twenty-Fourth Session of the Legislature of Minnesota, 1887.

THE RECORD OF A GALLANT, HONEST AND FEARLESS OFFICIAL.

UNBROKEN PLEDGES, FAITHFULLY KEPT PROMISES, NOBLE CONVICTIONS, AND TRUE FRIENDSHIP FOR THE AGRICULTURIST AND LABORER THE MOST STRIKING CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS BRILLIANT RECORD.

When on the first Tuesday of 1887, the Republican members of the present House of Representatives chose for their presiding officer the Hon. Wm. R. Merriam, of St. Paul, their action was certainly viewed with a great deal of apprehension in different and especially in the agricultural portions of our State. Two years before, with the Hon. John L. Gibbs as speaker, a new era of antimonopoly legislation had been inaugurated; and while the railroad and grain inspection laws of 1885 proved themselves meritorious, it had nevertheless been discovered that there were still many defects that enabled the corporations to evade the real and proper intents of the law. The people demanded that these defects be remedied and corrected so that the law could be enforced and certain abuses and evasions thereof made impossible. This is what agriculturists of our State demanded of the last legislature, and it is needless to say that they were somewhat disappointed when they heard that a St. Paul banker had been chosen to fill the very important position of Speaker. And without mistake the people had good reasons to be apprehensive. Their experience with men in high official positions, of similar vocations as that of Mr. Merriam in the past, coupled together with the fact of gross misrepresentations of Mr. Merriam's character by a portion of the state press, had given rise to prejudice which was very difficult to obliterate. But when the people expected to witness a repetition of former experiences, in this instance they were certainly pleasantly disappointed. Instead of bringing his influence and power as Speaker to bear in favor of monopolies, Mr. Merriam soon proved to the farmers and laboring people, that in him they had a firm and steadfast friend, and that all fair legislation demanded by them would have in Wm. R. Merriam a willing and able champion.

Unquestionably in all legislative bodies the complexion of the different committees shapes the legislation. This everybody knows and no one can deny. And right here is where the foresight, fidelity, honesty and executive capability of a presiding officer can be ascertained. A legislator of the monopoly stripe on an antimonopoly committee, a committee that would be expected to work out and report measures checking the grasping power of monopoly, or a working majority of such alleged friends of monopoly on any such committee, would certainly seriously embarrass good legislation or even make it practically impossible.

Now how was it with Mr. Merriam in this respect? The committee of most importance to the agriculturists of this State was certainly the Committee on Railroads. These corporations had gradually extended their powers until their extortions became unbearable.

The people uncompromisingly demanded that the statutes be so amended that they be made amenable to the common law, and that freight and passenger rates be reasonable and in accordance with the Republican platform of 1886, which declared for reasonable rates according to the capital actually invested, and not on fictitious and watered stock. No man in the State had done more to instruct and show the people how they had been plundered by these corporations than the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, and thus incurred the combined enmity and hostility of the corporations on one side, when on the other hand he had gained the admiration and confidence of the people. It is needless to say that of all the members of the present House of Representatives no man could have been made a member of the committee on Railroads that was as obnoxious to the Railroad monopolists as Ignatius Donnelly.

It is also needless to assert that if the combined lobbying power and influence of these corporations could have prevented it, he never would have been a member of this important committee.

And still Mr. Merriam, in obedience to the wishes of the people, and actuated by a desire to see justice done, appointed Mr. Donnelly as chairman of the Committee on Railroads; appointed him to a position where he could shape such legislation as was needed, and gave him as associates on that committee men who like himself were deeply interested in the welfare of the people. The committee on railroads consisted of the following gentlemen:

Most of these gentlemen had previously identified themselves with laboring to free the people from the plunderings of merciless corporate power, and several of them were members of the "Farmers Alliance."

Their task in shaping railroad legislation was not an easy one; the corporations fought for their self established privileges with a stubbornness worthy of a better cause.

Every measure of importance referred to this committee had to run the gauntlet of corporate condemnation, derision and ridicule. But, the committee, under the careful and vigilant leadership of Mr. Donnelly, proved itself equal to the emergency, and all attempts to frustrate the object of the committee were in vain.

Conspicuous among the measures referred to this committee and reported to the house was H. F. 238. "A bill for an act to fix maximum charges upon the transportation of wheat and its products upon railroad lines in the State of Minnesota," introduced by Mr. Donnelly on January 25, 1887, and defeated in the House after having been favorably reported from the committee on February 16. This bill, if it had become a law, would have saved thousands to the producer, and when Mr. Donnelly upon the defeat of the bill, charged that corrupt influences had been brought to bear in securing its defeat, and moved for a committee to investigate such alleged corruption, the Speaker appointed as such committee Messrs. Donnelly, Barker, Buffum, Reese and Powers, (J. of H. p. 472) and in announcing the committee made a special request that their investigation be "thorough" and that they "spare no one, but let the truth be known." This request of the Speaker was strictly observed, and the report of the committee created a sensation. (J. of H. pp. 679, 686.)

In the appointment of this committee the legislature and the people have the best evidence of the sincerity of Mr Merriam to "let the truth be known." While it would have been an easy matter for him to select a whitewashing committee, consisting of opponents of the bill in question, he did not; but on the other hand, of the five gentlemen composing the committee four had voted therefor and been earnest advocates of the same. (J. of H. p. 437.) Even Mr. Barker, who voted against the bill, was during the sessions of the investigating committee, always with the other members in trying to conscientiously sift and investigate the charges of corruption.

The committee also considered and reported favorably H. F. No. 8. "A bill for the taxation of Railroad Companies," which bill was passed by both branches. (J. of H. p. 198, J. of S. p. 197.)

Among the important senate bills referred to the committee and reported favorably and passed by the House were S. F. No. 8, "an act relating to the issuing of false, fraudulent and part paid and part unpaid shares of the stock of railroad companies, and providing a penalty therefor," (J. of H. pp. 745, 785, 138); also S. F. No. 16, "an act to define the liabilities of railroad companies in relation to damages sustained by their employees. (J. of H. pp. 187, 356, 430); also S. F. No. 557, "an act to regulate common carriers, and creating the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, and defining the duties of such Commission in relation to common carriers." (J. of H. pp. 652, 783, 839, 874).

This act was passed to remedy certain defects and omissions of the railroad law of 1885, the principal amendments being that of confering upon the commission, the power to establish reasonable maximum freight and passenger rates on the railroads in the State in certain cases. (Sec. 8, Chap. 10, G. L. 1887.)

To give this privilege to the commission was a universal request among the shippers and producers. On the whole the new railroad law of 1887, if properly and honestly enforced, will give the people all the protection from the encroachments of the roads that they need. But it must be enforced, and to accomplish this we need a courageous commission appointed by a courageous governor; and the man that appointed a legislative committee that reported such an act will also, if called upon, see that the law is strictly enforced.

It would make a lengthy document to enumerate all the meritorious legislation passed by the late session of the legislature, but we will mention a few more. Of the greatest interest to the agricultural and working classes H. F. No. 2, and H. F. No. 45. Both of these are constitutional amendments to be voted upon at the coming election. The first "in relation to freedom of markets," (J. of H. pp. 14, 43, 109, 198, 886,) and the second "to protect the rights of working men and women in certain cases," (J. of H. pp. 28, 106, 160, 311.) Another constitutional amendment to be voted upon this fall is H. F. No. 750, extending the legislative session from sixty to ninety days. All these laws were urgently demanded by the farming and laboring classes, opposed by the corporations and by the lobbying power of the cities. And in all the preliminary and subsequent struggles to secure the passage of these laws Mr. Merriam steadfastly and courageously cast his lot with those that were working with this in view; and when he had to choose in standing by the cities or by the country, in every instance was he found on the side of the latter. One of the most important bills introduced in the House was H. F. No. 1, "relating to the interest on money," introduced by Mr. Donnelly, (J. of H. pp. 14, 188, 780.) This bill proposed to reduce the legal rate of interest from ten to seven per cent. When the bill came in committee of the whole it would certainly have been defeated had not Mr. Merriam left the chair and by his conciliatory and fair propositions induced the members to agree on a reduction to eight per cent. Here we have an example of unselfishness rarely equaled, and certainly never in the annals of the legislative history of Minnesota.

Here Mr. Merriam proved conclusively that a man can be a banker and still be a man and friend of the people. While the prospects of continuing to charge usurious rates of interest led many a capitalist astray in the last legislature and finally secured the defeat of the bill referred to above. Mr. Merriam stood staunchly on the side of those who made such a gallant fight against usury, and the plunderings effected thereby. A man's actions always tell more than his words, and when we see a man disregard his own financial interests and boldly step to our side in the battle against monopoly and oppression, we have a true and powerful friend; one whom we can trust in all the emergencies that the high office of governor can throw upon his shoulders.

Another bill of the greatest interest to the producer that was passed by the House was the so-called "Williams 20 per cent. reduction bill." It provided for a 20 per cent. reduction of freight rates on all roads in the State, except in certain cases, and had it become a law, would have saved millions to the producer. Unfortunately the senate failed to pass the bill.

Then again all attempts of the warehouse men and grain dealers to amend the grain laws of 1885 so as to bond country elevators proved futile, owing to Mr. Merriam having appointed on the committee on grain and warehouse inspection an aggregation of men that stood firm and sacredly guarded the interests of the producer. "Country elevators must not be bonded," so said the platform of the "Farmers Alliance" of 1886, and Speaker Merriam appointed his grain inspection committee accordingly, and thus the good work of that committee began in 1885 was carried on and maintained.

Most of the above measures are only of direct importance to farmers, and all of them at all stages had the hearty support of Mr. Merriam. Now a word of reference in relation to a measure that concerns wage-workers, mechanics and laboring men in general. The Republican platform of 1886 declared against convict labor coming in competition with free labor, and in accordance therewith the House passed H. F. No. 14, "An act regulating the employment of convict labor." (J. of H. pp. 19, 188, 542.) The enforcement of this law will entail a large expense upon the State but still it will be carried out. Then there was passed by the House what is known as the Newell Garnishee law. H. F. No. 37. "An act to abolish the process of garnishments as applied to workingmen." (J. of H. pp. 28, 62, 279, 657.)

Then there was also passed S. F. No. 40. "An act establishing a bureau of labor statistics and appropriating money for the maintenance thereof." (J. of H. pp. 378, 492, 773, 614.) This law is in practical operation to-day and two prominent Knights of Labor are at the head of the Labor Bureau.

To make a long story short it can be truthfully asserted that the laboring men got everything they asked for and in all the measures proposed in their interest they were assisted, and their efforts supported by Speaker Merriam.

If there is any class of men that have good reasons to gratefully remember the last session of the legislature it is the laboring men, and this they can do by giving "honor to whom honor is due." It is generally conceded that of both branches of the legislature the House stands nearest to the people, and who can deny that it would have been impossible to pass many of the laws above referred to if a friend of monopoly had occupied the Speaker's chair and by the appointment of his committees shaped legislation. The passage of such meritorious legislation is the very best evidence and the strongest proof that the deliberations of the House were presided over by a man of the people and a friend of the oppressed.

In the appointment of his committees Mr. Merriam paid less attention to party ties than to ability and honesty. Thus he appointed Mr. Donnelly at the head of the railroad committee, Mr. Furlong, another Alliance man, at the head of the committee to investigate the cost of construction of railroads; and Mr. Colby chairman of the joint committee on labor, the latter committee being an entire new feature in legislative committees. Of all the important committees with the exception of the committee on judiciary, Mr. Merriam gave the chairmanship to the country districts, and not the chairmanship alone but also a good working majority of the members of the committees.

The "State Farmers' Alliance" at its annual meeting in February, 1887, recognizing the services of Lieut. Governor Rice and Speaker Merriam, adopted the following resolution:

SECTION II.

Resolved, That the State Alliance thank the state legislature for the noble work it is doing in behalf of the people, in both branches; and that we desire to express our approval of the course of Lieutenant Governor Rice, president of the senate, and of Hon. W. R. Merriam, speaker of the house, for their fair and just manner in which shey appointed the committees of the senate and house.

And on the last day of the session the following resolution was offered by Mr. Donnelly and unanimously adopted by a rising vote:

Resolved, That this House desires in this formal manner to express its high sense of the fairness, impartiality, ability and parliamentary skill displayed by the Hon. Wm. R. Merriam Speaker of the House, in the discharge of the duties of his responsible and difficult office. We believe that he has tried to hold the scale of justice even-handed, and that he has proved faithful to all the great interests of the state, in the administration of the trust reposed in it. The House desires to express in this way its hearty and unanimous desire for his future prosperity and happiness. (J. of H. p. 899.)

And thus came to a close the legislative record of a presiding officer of the House of Representatives who in all future time will be remembered as the farmers' and the laboring man's friend; whose record will stand the closest scrutiny of all people in favor of good legislation; who stands pre-eminently as a personal illustration of honesty, integrity and fidelty to the various interests of our great state, the champion of peoples rights and the enemy of monopoly and oppression. He was weighed in the balance and not found wanting.

This man has been nominated by the Republcans of this State for governor; and here we may ask: who was it that nominated him? Was it the delegations from the cities? Was it those engaged in monopolses and connected with the large corporations? No. Mr. Merriam was placed in nomination by those whom he had befriended and supported while Speaker of the House, by the rural districts of the State. It is the first time in the political history of the state that a man has been placed in nomination for the high office of governor whose nomination was not manipulated and brought about by the delegation from the large citses.

While Mr. Merrian is a city man his nomination is distinctly a country nomination and as such a fitting reward of merit. He will if elected be under no obligations to these cities; he is in no shape or manner allied or connected with the railroad and grain monopolists; and will be in the truest sense of the word a people's governor.

True, Mr. Merriam is a banker; but what has a man's vocation to do if he embodies in himself official honesty and unselfishness, as Mr. Merriam has proven that he does? Fearlessness, honesty, executive ability, unselfishness, and the confidence of the agricultural and labor voters, who have placed him in nomination for the highest office in the gift of the people of this State, are his record, and upon that record he goes before the people soliciting their suffrages.

Look out for campaign lies. No one should be influenced by any story against any candidate sprung by the opposition when too late for denial. It is said that when Mr. Canning was in the city he boasted that he had in his possession certain affidavits that would crush Mr. Comstock. If this be true, the only object he could have in withholding them is to spring them at the last moment, when too late to answer. Neither side should pay any attention to such nefarious methods.

In his closing remarks, Prof. Hyde called upon his hearers to give Supt. Elliot their most earnest support, saying he was well worthy their best efforts, having by faithful and efficient service, gained for himself a recognized place in the front rank of state educators. These words of commendation, he emphatically declared, were voluntarily given and not at the wish of Supt. Elliot. In connection with the above, we might add that we had a special reporter (this, too, without Mr. E's knowledge) at the Institute, whose business it was to look into the prevailing sentiment among teachers, and that the most flattering encouragement for Mr. Elliot was everywhere apparent, even among Third party sympathizers. Voters may draw their own conclusions.

Chris. Thieman, a painter at A. C. Schmidt's shop, died at his boarding house on Broadway, on Sunday evening, Oct. 21st. Chris. was well known, having lived here several years. He was by trade a painter, but owing to ill health was obliged to give it up, so he came to this country, took up a claim at Black River, and went to work on a farm, hoping to recover his health. He was so far successful that after several years he returned to his trade again. He was taken with typhoid fever, and although everything possible was done for him that loving friends could do, it was in vain, and he passed away on Sunday evening. His remains were sent to Evansville, Ill., his old home, on Tuesday evening, for interment.

MURDER.

Chief of Police Hayes Shot Down in Cold Blood.

On Friday evening our community was startled by the report that chief of police, M. B. Hayes, had been shot down in Max Ericsson's saloon. It appears that on Thursday evening the police had arrested a suspicious looking character and locked him up in the cooler. As is customary in such cases the prisoner was searched and among other things, $4 in money was taken from him. On Friday morning, when released, the money was given him, but he insisted that $24 had been taken from him. He was around all day threatening to shoot the police on sight. About 5 o'clock, chief Hayes was in at Max Ericsson's talking with some of our citizens when the man came up to the east end of the bar, about 6 feet from chief Hayes and, without a word, pulled a 32 self-cocking revolver, took deliberate aim and fired at the chief. Before the crowd could recover from its consternation, and before a move was made the villain fired again, whereupon chief Hayes sprang upon him, followed by everybody in the room, and bore the assassin to the floor. In the struggle he fired two more shots before the revolver could be taken away from him. Hayes got up and seeing a man stamping the life out of the fellow he commanded him to desist, told policeman McDonald to arrest the man and lock him up. D. Jacobus and Jim Creighton assisted chief Hayes to his home, where Dr. Dunlop probed the wounds, and to the surprise of everybody found them to be not necessarily of a fatal nature. One bullet had passed through the fleshy part of the right arm, one through the fleshy part of the left hip, and one a few inches higher up, all three balls coming out. For a time the excitement ran high and the prospects of a necktie party were good, but better councils prevailed, and the desperado escaped with life. On Tuesday the man was arraigned before Justice Spendley, waived examination and was committed for trial. He gives his name as James Payton. At last accounts chief Hayes was getting along nicely with good prospects for an early recovery, but it was an extremely close shave.

Burglary.

On Monday night an attempt was made to burglarize the store of C. H. Saake, but was thwarted by the inner iron door which Saake took the precaution to put in some time since. He found on entering the store on Tuesday morning that somebody had cut through the wooden door with a knife and coming to the iron door gave it up as a bad job. A good thorough vigilance committee would be a good thing for awhile, until those light-fingered gentry take their departure southward.

A Slugger.

On Saturday, Oct. 13th, as R. C. Mitchell, editor of the Duluth Tribune, was going into the post office in that city, he was accosted by C. E. Shannon, prohibition candidate for Attorney General, and turning was met by a sharp blow in the face. It seems that the Tribune had published an article to the effect that the aforesaid Shannon drank some pear cider. The item was given a Tribune reporter by Gil. Hartley. Mr. Mitchell, when he saw the article, gave orders that it should not be published and claims that a subordinate, through a misconception of the order, had it set, and it was published. Be that as it may, we can see no credit in the act of pumelling Mr. Mitchell, unless it be to prove the fighting qualities of the prohibs.

Woodside Items.

Fall has come and the hum of the threshing machine once more greets our ear. Wheat, although considerably less than last year's yield, will surely average sixteen bushels to the acre in this town, and if old Hutch brings the price up to two dollars per bushel, the farmers in this vicinity will no doubt be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. S. H. Dunfee got 75 bushels of wheat from three acres, and 60 bushels oats to the acre.

Mr. G. H. Baxter, who came from Wisconsin last spring, to seek a future home in Woodside, sold a nice span of horses to Martin Nelson last week. Mr. Nelson says he is tired of oxen and will have horses if they cost a farm.

Our merchants are all stocking up for winter. Call on John Tagley & Sons for your fall goods which they sell at figures so low that it will surprise you.

The common salutation now is "have you seen anything of the railroad?"

Several thousand cords of wood will be cut in Woodside next winter ready for shipment when the iron horse comes through.

Rev. A. A. Davis, from Fosston, will hold services in the Woodside school house next Sunday. All be sure to come.

We have heard several wonder who in the world the "Farmer" is. Well, I will tell you. He is a God forsaken Catholic who gets his news from Sarraban. Now, gentle reader, guess again. FARMER.

Beltrami Telaugraphs.

BELTRAMI, Oct. 22, 1888.

Miss Phelps, of Ada, who has been taking care of her sister during her illness, returned home Saturday.

Our prohibitionist friends will do well to think over the remarks of Prof. Hyde, of the St. Cloud Normal school, the leading educator in the state, at the teachers' institute last week. His words are: "In closing the Institute I want to say a word to the citizens as well as the teachers regarding your Superintendent. He is known all over the state as an earnest, industrious educator, and you will advance the cause of education in this county by giving him your hearty support."

Mrs. Fulton is improving slowly, but is still quite ill.

Chief of Police Hayes, of Crookston, has many friends and sympathizers in this community who hope he will soon be well again.

The passenger train was delayed here for a number of hours last evening.

The Democratic Annex.

The democratic annex, yclept the prohibition party, held a meeting at the opera house on Thursday evening last at which their candidate for governor, Hugh Harrison, and their candidate for congressman, Zar D. Scott indulged in some high-flown and unreliable rhetoric for the amusement of a few, who dropped in to see what they had to say anyway. The weather was such as should have suited the most zealous advocate of cold water, a cold dismal rain prevailing. Mr. Scott is said to have given the impression of being an exceedingly light weight, while Mr. Harrison did not leave the impression that he was the best candidate to fill the gubernatorial chair of any man in existence. He said that if the republicans did not fool away their votes as they did in 1884 the republican national ticket would be elected. No doubt had the weather been favorable there would have been a good audience for many, out of curiosity desired to hear what excuse those third party folks have to offer for voting to strangle temperance reform. To the republican party is due everything ever accomplished for temperance reform and now these enthusiasts want to down the republican party!

Communicated.

New York Sun: "Do you know, sir," said a long-haired passenger, with his greasy Prince Albert buttoned tight about his neck, "that I have been a prohibitionist for 30 years?" "Is that so?" replied the other. "Thank heaven I have never been as unfortunate as all that, but I've had inflammatory rheumatism for 10 years!"

Our heart goes out in sympathy to brother A. M. Childs, who is at present suffering from a severe attack of both complaints. OBSERVER.

They Give it Up

The Democrats Have Abandoned All Hope of Carrying New York State For Cleveland

Pioneer Press:

New York Special Correspondence, Oct. 12.—There is anguish at Democratic head-quarters.

Why!

Well, New York is given up.

Not alone has the Empire State been considered a great state to get away with, but up to a few days ago it had been thought to be "pie" by the supporters of Mr. Cleveland.

To-day some friends of mine, who are inside the rail at Democratic headquarters, told me the jig was thought to be up. That is the technical fashion of saying the fight is acknowledged to be over, so far as New York is concerned.

There is a three-cornered contest here in the city that is amusing to the outside beholder. Mr. Cleveland's supporters are attached to the belief that Gov. Hill ought not to be re-elected.

Gov. Hill's supporters are dead sure that Mr. Cleveland should not be returned to office. Thus the Democratic outfit is riven in twain as between Cleveland and Hill.

The mugwumps hate Hill. They regard him as a wicked, sinful exponent of the "spoils" system. The out-and-out Democrats in New York are equally bitter against Cleveland. They had looked for offices, seeing that he came from this particular state. They didn't get the offices, and they now swear they will re-elect Hill governor and pulverize Cleveland for president.

So it has come to be a question between the mugwump wing of the party and the party itself, so to speak. And the situation is aggravated by the astute conduct of Charles A. Dana, who never liked Cleveland, and who has put that personage into a percious quandary by demanding, day after day, in the Sun, that Mr. Cleveland write a letter to the Democracy of New York calling for a harty and whole-souled support of Gov. Hill.

Mr. Dana knows Mr. Cleveland cannot write such a letter without alienating the mugwumps; he also knows that if the letter is not written, Cleveland will lose the support of the rank and file of the Democracy who are closely attached to Hill.

So it comes to this, that Mr. Dana has placed Mr. Cleveland in a dilemma, neither horn of which he dares clutch.

You ought to go around to the national headquarters of the Democratic party and hear what the leaders say about Dana. They are the hottest and maddest crowd you ever ran across.

Why, one member of the committee, who happened to run across Col. John Garnett, of Mr. Dana's staff, the other night in a barroom on Broadway, made the quarrel personal, and actually drew a revolver on the colonel in support of his warfare on Dana.

The various complications heretofore cited are added to by the politics of the city itself, where of course the main vote of the Democracy in this state is cast. There are two important Democratic organizations here. One is Tammany, and the other is the County Democracy. Tammany has nominated a full line of city and county officials; the County Democracy has started a separate ticket. The Tammany organization supports Hill and knifes Cleveland. The county Democracy, with Abram S. Hewitt at its head supports Cleveland and shys Hill. So the house is divided against itself.

The trouble is that the Democracy here has had little or no federal patronage since the present administration came into power. There is still a republican postoffice in New York, and the kicking has been stupendous. The old line Democrats have howled for a change, have not got it, and have given up hope of succor from Cleveland. Consequently they are saying, in the classic language of the Democrcy. "To the deuce with national politics. We control the city, and we mean to retain it. Cleveland has done nothing for us; why should we do anything for him? We will carry the city all right, and we will let Mr. Cleveland go plumb to blazes."

'Tis in the open rebellion one comes across all along the line. You can see and hear it everywhere. There is no concealment anywhere. At Democratic headquarters there is the sort of despair that means the launching of schemes in the West to possibly overplay the results. But, what happens elsewhere, mark my words when I say, New York in 1888, is republican.

AGAINST SUICIDE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 14.—At the Tabernacle this morning, the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., took for his text Acts xi, 25 and 26:

"He drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, 'Do thyself no harm.'"

The sermon was as follows:

Here is a would-be suicide arrested in his deadly attempt. He was a sheriff, and according to the Roman law, a bailiff himself must suffer the punishment due an escaped prisoner; and if the prisoner breaking jail was sentenced to be endungeoned for three or four years; and if the prisoner breaking jail was to have suffered capital punishment, then the sheriff must suffer capital punishment. The sheriff had received especial charge to keep a sharp lookout for Paul and Silas. The government had not had confidence in bolts and bars to keep safe these two clergymen, about whom there seemed to be something strange and supernatural.

Sure enough by miraculous power, they are free, and the sheriff, waking out of a sound sleep, and supposing these ministers have run away, and knowing that they were to die for preaching Christ, and realizing that he must therefore die, rather than go under the executioner's ax on the morrow and suffer public disgrace, resolves to precipitate his own decease. But before the sharp, keen, glittering dagger of the sheriff could strike his heart, one of the unloosened prisoners arrests the blade by the command: "Do thyself no harm.

In olden time, and where Christianity had not interfered with it, suicide was considered honorable and a sign of courage. Demosthenes poisoned himself when told that Alexander's ambassador had demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators. Isocrates killed himself rather than surrender to Philip of Macedon. Cato, rather than submit to Julius Cæsar, took his own life, and after three times his wounds had been dressed tore them open and perished. Mithridates killed himself rather than submit to Pompey, the conqueror. Hannibal destroyed his life by poison from his ring, considering life unbearable. Lycurgus a suicide. Brutus a suicide. After the disaster at Moscow, Napoleon always carried with him a preparation of opium, and one night his servant heard the Emperor arise, put something in a glass and drink it, and soon after the groans aroused all the attendants, and it was only through utmost medical skill he was resuscitated from the stupor of the opiate.

Times have changed, and yet the American conscience needs to be toned up on the subject of suicide. Have you seen a paper in the last month that did not announce the passage out of life by one's own behest? Defaulters, alarmed at the idea of exposure, quit life precipitately. Men losing large fortunes go out of the world because they cannot endure earthly existence. Frustrated affection, domestic infelicity, dyspeptic impatience, anger, remorse, envy, jealousy, destitution, misanthropy are considered sufficient causes for absconding this life by paris green, by laudnum, by belladonna, by Othello's dagger, by halter, by leap from the abutment of a bridge, by firearms. More cases of felo de se in the last two years than any two years of the world's existence, and more in the last month than in any 12 months. The evil is more and more spreading.

A pulpit not long ago expressed some doubt as to whether there was really anything wrong about quitting this life when it became disagreeable, and there are found in respectable circles people apologetic for the crime which Paul in the text arrested. I shall show you before I get through that suicide is the worst of all crimes, and I shall lift a warning unmistakable. But in the early part of this sermon I wish to admit that some of the best Christians that have ever lived have committed self-destruction, but always in dementia, and not responsible. I have no more doubt about their eternal felicity than I have of the Christian who dies in the delirium of typhoid fever. While the shock of the catastrophe is very great, I charge all those who have had Christian friends under cerebral aberration step off the boundaries of this life, to have no doubt about their happiness. The dear Lord took them right out of their dazed and frenzied state into perfect safety. How Christ feels toward the insane you may know from the kind way he treated the demoniac of Gadara and the child lunatic, and the potency with which he hushed tempests either of sea or brain.

Scotland, the land prolific of intellectual giants, had none grander than Hugh Miller. Great for science and great for God. He came of the best Highland blood, and was a decendant of Donald Roy, a man eminent for piety and the rare gift of second sight. His attainments, climbing up as he did from the quarry and the wall of the stone mason, drew forth the astonished admiration of Buckland and Murchison, the scientists, and Dr. Chalmers, the theologian, and held universities spellbound while he told them the story of what he had seen of God in the old red sandstone.

That man did more than any other being that ever lived to show that the God of the hills is the God of the Bible, and he struck his tuning fork on the rocks of Cromarty until he brought geology and theology accordant in divine worship. His two books, entitled "Footprints of the Creator" and the "Testimony of the Rocks," proclaimed the bans of an everlasting marriage between genuine science and revelation. On this latter book he toiled day and night through love of nature and love of God, until he could not sleep, and his brain gave way, and he was found dead with a revolver by his side, the cruel instrument having had two bullets—one for him and the other for the gunsmith who at the coroner's inquest was examining it and fell dead. Have you any doubt of the beatification of Hugh Miller, after his hot brain had ceased throbbing that wintry night in his study at Portobello? Among the mightiest of earth, among the mightiest of heaven.

No one doubted the piety of William Cowper, the author of those three great hymns, "Oh, for a Closer Walk with God," "What Various Hindrances We Meet," "There Is a Fountain Filled with Blood." William Cowper, who shares with Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley the their honor of Christian hymnology. In hypochondria he resolved to take his own life, and rode to the river Thames, but found a man seated on some goods at the very point which he expected to spring, and rode back to his home, and that night he threw himself upon his own knife, but the blade broke; and then he hanged himself to the ceiling, but the rope parted. No wonder that when God mercifully delivered him from that awful dementia he sat down and wrote that other hymn just as memorable:

> "God moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform:
> He plants His footsteps in the sea,
> And rides upon the storm.
>
> "Blind unbelief is sure to err
> And scan His work in vain;
> God is His own interpreter,
> And He will make it plain.

While we make this merciful and righteous allowance in regard to those who were plunged into mental incoherence, I declare that that man who in the use of his reason, by his own act, snaps the bond between his body and soul goes straight into perdition. Shall I prove it? Revelation xxi: 8: "Murderers shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Revelations xxii., 15: "Without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers and murderers." You do not believe the New Testament? Then, perhaps you believe the Ten Commandments; "Thou shalt not kill." Do you say all these passages refer to the taking of the life of others? Then I ask you if you are not as responsible for your own life as for the life of others? God gave you a special trust in your life. He made you the custodian of your life as He made you the custodian of no other life. He gave you as weapons with which to defend it two arms to strike back assailants, two eyes to watch for invasion and a natural love of life which ought ever to be on the alert. Assassination of others is a mild crime compared with the assassination of yourself, because in the latter case it is treachery to an especial trust; it is the surrender of a castle you were especially appointed to keep; it is treason to a natural law, and it is treason to God added to ordinary murder.

To show how God in the Bible looked upon this crime, I point you to the rogue's picture gallery in some parts of the Bible, the pictures of the people who have committed this unnatural crime. Here is the headless trunk of Saul on the walls of Bethshan. Here is the man that chased little David—10 feet in stature chasing four. Here is the man who consulted a clairvoyant, Witch of Endor. Here is a man who whipped in battle, instead of surrendering his sword with dignity, as many a man has done, asks his servant to slay him; and when the servant declines, then the giant plants the hilt of his sword in the earth, the sharp point sticking upward, and he throws his body on it and expires, the coward, the suicide. Here is Ahithophel, the Machiavelli of olden times, betraying his best friend David in order that he may become prime minister of Absalom, and joining that fellow in his attempt at parricide. Not getting what he wanted by change of politics, he takes a short cut out of a disgraced life into the suicide's eternity. There he is, the ingrate!

Here is Abimelech, practically a suicide. He is with an army, bombarding a tower, when a woman in the tower takes a grindstone from its place and drops it upon his head, and with what life he has left in his cracked skull he commands his armor-bearer: "Draw thy sword and slay me, lest men say a woman slew me" There is his post-mortem photograph in the book of Samuel. But the hero of this group is Judas Iscariot. Dr. Donne says he was a martyr, and we have in our day apologists for him. And what wonder, in this day when we have a book revealing Aaron Burr as a pattern of virtue, and in this day when we uncover a statue to George Sand as the benefactress of literature, and in this day when there are betrayals of Christ on the part of some of His pretended apostles—a betrayal so black it makes the infamy of Judas Iscariot white. Yet this man by his own hand hung up for the execration of all the ages, Judas Iscariot.

All the good men and women of the Bible left to God the decision of their earthly terminus, and they could have said with Job, who had a right to commit suicide if any man ever had—what with his destroyed property, and his body all aflame with insufferable carbuncles, and everything gone from his home but the chief curse of it, a pestiferous wife, and four garrulous people pelting him with comfortless talk while he sits on a heap of ashes scratching his scabs with a piece of broken pottery, yet crying out in triumph: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come."

Notwithstanding the Bible is against this evil, and the aversion which it creates by the loathsome and ghastly spectacle of those who have hurled themselves out of life, and notwithstanding Christianity is against it, and the arguments and the useful lives and the illustrious deaths of its deciples, it is a fact alarmingly patent that suicide is on the increase.

What is the cause? I charge upon infidelity and agnosticism this whole thing. If there be no hereafter, or if that hereafter be blissful without reference to how we live and how we die, why not move back the folding doors between this world and the next? And when our existence here becomes troublesome, why not pass right over into Elysium? Put this down among your most solemn reflections, and consider it after you go to your homes, there has never been a case of suicide where the operator was not neither demented, and therefore irresponsible, or an infidel. I challenge all the ages, and I challenge the whole universe. There never has been a case of self-destruction while in full appreciation of his immortality and of the fact that that immortality would be glorious or wretched according as he accepted Jesus Christ or rejected Him.

You say it is business trouble, or you say it is electrical currents, or it is this, or it is that, or it is the other thing. Why not go clear back, my friend, and acknowledge that in every case it is the abdication of reason or the teaching of infidelity which practically says: "If you don't like this life get out of it, and you will land either in annihilation, where there are no notes to pay, no persecutions to suffer, no gout to torment, or you will land where there will be everything glorious and nothing to pay for it. Infidelity always has been apologetic for self-immolation. After Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" was published and widely read there was a marked increase in self-slaughter.

A man in London heard Mr. Owen deliver his infidel lecture on socialism and went home, sat down an wrote these words: "Jesus Christ is one of the weakest characters in history, and the Bible is the greatest possible deception," and then shot himself. David Hume wrote these words: "It would be no crime for me to divert the Nile or the Danube from its natural bed. Where, then, can be the crime in my diverting a few drops of blood from their ordinary channel?" And having written the essay he loaned it to a friend, the friend read it, wrote a letter of thanks and admiration, and shot himself. Appendix to the same book.

Rousseau, Voltaire, Gibbon, Montaigne, under certain circumstances, were apologetic for self-immolation. Infidelity puts up no bar to people's rushing out from this world into the next. They teach us it does not make any difference how you live here or go out of the world, you will land either in oblivious nowhere or a glorious somewhere. And infidelity holds the upper end of the rope for the suicide, and aims the pistol with which a man blows his brains out, and mixes the strychnine for the last swallow. If infidelity could carry the day and persuade the majority of people in this country that it does not make any difference how you go out of the world you will land safely, the Hudson and East rivers would be so full of corpses the ferryboats would be impeded in their progress, and the crack of the suicide's pistol would be more alarming than the rumble of a street car.

I have sometimes heard it discussed whether the great dramatist was a Christian or not. I do not know, but I know that he considered appreciation of a future existence the mightiest hindrance to self-destruction.

> "For who could bear the whips and scorns of time.
> The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
> The pangs of despis'd love, the law's delay,
> The insolence of office, and the spurns
> That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
> When he himself might his quietus make
> With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
> To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
> But that the dread of something after death—
> The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
> No traveler returns—puzzles the will?"

Would God that the coroners would be brave in rendering the right verdict, and when in a case of irresponsibility they say: "While this man was demented he took his life"; in the other case say: "Having read infidel books and attended infidel lectures, which obliterated from this man's mind all appreciation of anything like future retribution, he committed self-slaughter!"

Ah! Infidelity, stand up and take thy sentence! In the presence of God and angels and men, stand up, thou monster, thy lip blasted with blasphemy, thy cheek scarred with lust, thy breath foul with the corruption of the ages! Stand up, Satyr, filthy goat, buzzard of the nations, leper of the centuries! Stand up, thou monster Infidelity! Part man, part panther, part reptile, part dragon, stand up and take thy sentence! Thy hands red with the blood in which thou hast washed, thy feet crimson with the human gore through which thou hast waded, stand up and take thy sentence! Down with thee to the pit and sup on the sobs and groans of families thou hast blasted, and roll on the bed knives which thou hast sharpened for others, and let thy music be the everlasting miserere of those whom thou hast dammed! I brand the forehead of infidelity with all the crimes of self-immolation for the last century on the part of those who had their reason.

My friends, if ever your life through its abrasions and its molestations should seem to be unbearable, and you are tempted to quit it by your own behest, do not consider yourself as worse than others. Christ himself was tempted to cast himself from the roof of the Temple; but as He resisted, so resist ye. Christ came to medicine all your wounds. In your trouble I prescribe life instead of death. People who have had it worse than you will ever have it have gone songful on the way. Remember that God keeps the chronology of your life with as much precision as he keeps the chronology of nations, your death as well as your cradle.

Why was it that at midnight, just at midnight, the destroying angel struck the blow that set the Israelites free from bondage? The 430 years were up at 12 o'clock that night. The 430 years were not up at 11, and 1 o'clock would have been tardy and too late. The 430 years were up at 12 o'clock and the destroying angel struck the blow, and Israel was free. And God knows just the hour when it is time to lead you up from earthly bondage. By his grace make the most of [illegible] Your everlasting rewards will accord with you earthly perturbations, just as Caius gave to Agrippa a chain of gold as heavy as had been a chain of iron. For the asking—and I do not know to whom I speak in this august assemblage, but the word may be especially appropriate— for your asking you may have the same grace that was given to the Italian martyr, Algerius, why, down in the darkest of dungeons, dated his letter from "the delectable orchard of the Leonine prison."

And remember that this brief life of ours is surrounded by a rim, a very thin but very important rim, and close up to that rim is a great eternity, and you had better keep out of it until God breaks that rim and separates this from that. To get rid of the sorrows of earth, do not rush into greater sorrows. To get rid of a swarm of summer insects, leap not into a jungle of Bengal tigers.

There is a sorrowless world, and it is so radiant that the noonday sun is only the lowest doorstep and the aurora that lights up our southern heavens, confounding astronomers as to what it can be, is the waving of the banners of the procession come to take the conquerors home from church militant to church triumphant, and you and I have 10,000 reasons for wanting to go there, but we will never get there either by self-immolation or impenitency. All our sins slain by the Christ who came to do that thing, we want to go in at just the time divinely arranged, and from a couch divinely spread, and then the clang of the sepulchral gates behind us will be overpowered by the clang of the opening of the solid pearl before us. O God, what ever others may choose, give me a Christian's life, a Christian's death, a Christian's burial, a Christian's immortality!

A Cowboy Shooting-Match.

One curious shooting scrape that took place in Medora was worthy of being chronicled by Bret Harte. It occurred in the summer of 1884, I believe, but it may have been the year following. I did not see the actual occurrence, but I saw both men immediately afterwards, and I heard the shooting, which took place in a saloon on the bank, while I was swimming my horse across the river, holding my rifle up so as not to wet it. I will not give their full names, as I am not certain what has become of them, though I was told that one had since been either put in jail or hanged, I forgot which. One of them was a saloon-keeper familiarly called Welshy. The other man, Hay, had been bickering with him for some time. One day Hay, who had been defeated in a wrestling-match by one of my own boys and was out of temper, entered the other's saloon and became very abusive. The quarrel grew more and more violent, and suddenly Welshy whipped out his revolver and blazed away at Hay. The latter staggered slightly, shook himself, stretched out his hand, and gave back to his would-be slayer the ball, saying: "Here, man, here's the bullet." It had glanced along the breast-bone, gone into the body, and come out at the point of the shoulder, when, being spent, it dropped down the sleeve into his hand.—The Century.

Confederate Gol

Chicago Times.

It is a late hour in the lobby of a hotel. A man comes in, looks around and bows to a few acquaintances. There is something in his appearance, in his dress, which works the impression that he has seen better days. An acquaintance says, "Let me introduce Maj. Steele."

"Dr. Steele, if you please," the man says in a courtly way.

Dr. Steele was at the head of the cavalry that was hurrying Jefferson Davis away from the pursuing Yankees when the head of the lost cause was overtaken. He had charge of the confederacy, for although Lee's men were starving the vaults of the confederacy at Richmond were full of gold. You have often heard and seen the inquiry in print, "What became of the gold that was taken away from Richmond when Davis left it?" I am told that Maj. Steele could answer that if he wanted to. There is a story that he divided it among the officers whom Davis designated. Steele's lips are silent on that subject.

"You're Stabbed, Don't You Know?"

Brundage H. Welton, who is one of the best known insurance men in Central New York, was standing in the cigar store of Wilcox Brothers, in Bainbridge, N. Y., the other day, when Wm. Gilbert, a cigarmaker, walked in and, stepping up to him, punched him in the side, as was supposed with his fist. Welton said: Don't punch a fellow that way; you hurt."

"But you're stabbed, don't you know," grinned Gilbert, punching him again. "Look and see," Welton unbuttoned his coat and the bystanders were horrified to see a great quantity of blood. "Didn't know, it eh?" chuckled Gilbert, as he drove his blade, a long jack-knife, into his victim a third time. The murderer was at once secured and taken from the populace, who would have lynched him. Welton will die and his wife, who is in delicate health, can hardly survive the shock. There is no cause for the murder, and it is generally supposed that Gilbert is crazy.

"My young friend," said old Mr. Surplus to young Mr. Giddiboy, "do you not think that you were rash to ask my daughter to marry you when you are not able to support her?" "Well," said the young man, craftily, "perhaps I was. I admit my fault and throw myself on your generosity, sir." That's right," declared the old gentleman. "You shall not lose by it, I assure you. There, sir, is a nickel to pay your car fare home. No thanks, if you please. Good day, Mr. Giddiboy."

"Mother, do you know why they call then irons you're ironing with 'sad irons?'" "No, Johnny, I don't." "Well, I do. It's because they have to listen to so much talkin' when you're ironin' with them that it makes them sad; and doggone if I blame 'em either. They ought to call the table and chairs and everything in the room sad, too, 'cause they have to stay in here and listen to you. I must go out now, or I'll [illegible] myself."—Kentucky State Journal.

Curiosities of Currency.

From Texas Siftings.

Almost every nation and tribe, as well as every epoch, has its peculiar currency. Not only gold, silver, copper, brass, iron, lead and paper, but glass, shells, beads, books, stones, soap, bits of various colored cloth and numerous other articles have been used to represent money. The Burmese, Karens and Ghans have no coined money, lead and silver in bullion being the ordinary tender in trade, weight and purity being the standard of value. It must be a curious spectacle to see a Burmese out on a "hurrah" with a lot of pig lead to spend at bars.

Salt was, for a long time, the ordinary money of the Abyssinians, which rendered it difficult for them to get a fresh supply when they were broke. Fish has long been and is now the legal tender of Iceland "Shad scales" as money probably originated there.

The Carthagenians were the first to introduce a stamped leather currency. Leather coins with a silver nail in the center were issued in France by King John the Good in 1806, but they are not good now.

In the interior towns of Northern China slips of the bark of the mulberry tree, bearing the imperial "chop" and a stamp to denote their worth, have long been used as we use bank notes, and malefactors who conterfeited them got the imperial "chop" also. Marco Polo found this kind of money there in his time, and they have still an extensive local circulation.

In some small villages in Scotland laborers formerly carried in their pockets nails in place of coin to "pay on the nail" for the day's supply of bread and ale, just as a native Australian divests himself of a string of beads for the purchase of some coveted luxury.

A Scotch missionary to a little group of islands in the South Pacific found bits of red flannel circulating as money, when they were not needed to tie up a sore throat. This came about in a curious manner. The body of a shipwrecked sailor had drifted ashore, and to these untutored savages, who had never before seen clothing of any description, his red flannel shirt was an object of wonder and admiration. By common consent they cut the garment into shreds, which thenceforth became the currency of the island. A savage destitute of flannel was said to have "nary red," we suppose.

A Finnish Girl's Farewell.

At Tavastehuus I saw a group of eight or ten women, all well dressed, on the platform of the railway station. One of them was a rosy faced, pretty girl fo 20. She carried a magnificent bouquet. She was the recipient of much attention from the others, who kissed her twice around. When the last warning bell rang she was locked in the arms of an elderly woman, who, with streaming eyes, strained her again and again to her heart, and I saw, asked the good God to bless her child. I knew they were mother and daughter. As the train pulled out the girl stood upon the car platform and bade them adieu with wet cheeks. But I thought I saw a ray—a gleam of cherry hope shining through her tears. I asked a man where she was going. Till America—till Minnesota," was the reply.

Ah! I then read that hopeful light in her tearful eyes. She was leaving friends and kindred to go all alone to the far off land, where her lover had gone before, and to fill the nest he had built up for his coming mate. Who knows what places high in the world the young to be hatched in that free nest may fill in the lake state of the north.—Carter Harrison in Chicago Mail.

No Wonder He Felt Old.

"The singular mistake," explains the editor of a Texas paper, "by which our leading editorial appeared at the bottom of a column on the third page was caused by our having intrusted the setting up of the same to a long slabsided Yankee jour printer who happened along and wanted a job. We told him to make up the forms and work the papers off while we went home to give our wife some much-needed assistance in making her apple-butter. The article was in relation to the recent act of the governor in pardoning a sheep thief, and was headed 'Crowning Folly.' The blundering tramp set it up 'Cranberry Jelly' and chucked the article in the department of 'Useful Household Recipes.' It is such things as these that make the life of a journalist one of constant care and anxiety and make him an old man before his time."

Eli Perkins on Bed Bugs.

A remarkable case of the death of a woman was reported recently from Franklin township, Beaver county, Pa. The death occurred while the woman was suffering from a violent attact of the heahache, to which she had been subject for nearly three years she has been living in a house which has been badly infested with bed bugs. Shortly after moving into it she began to be troubled with a strange type of a headache which seemed to increase in violence with each returning attack until at times she was renderd unconscious by the severe pains, which she often described as resembling a heavy weight or presure on the top of her head. The peculiar nature of the case and his inability to render relief aroused the attending physician's curiosity and with the consent of the bereaved husband he cut open the skull after the woman's death. He found firmly lodged on the top of the brain in a clotted mass, a number of bedbugs. How they got there baffles all who have heard of the case.

Lung Troubles and Wasting

Diseases can be cured, if properly treated in time, as shown by the following statement from D. C. FREEMAN, Sydney: "Having been a great sufferer from pulmonary attacks, and gradually wasting away for the past two years, it affords me pleasure to testify that Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil with Lime and Soda has given me great relief, and I cheerfully recommend it to all suffering in a similar way to myself. In addition, I would say that it is very pleasant to take.

A fatal wreck occurred on the Cumberland Valley railroad, near Shippensburg. Trains Nos. 14 and 9 collided at a sharp curve in the road, telescoping the cars and completely demolishing the engines.

We invite your attention to the advertisement of Dr. F. B. Golley, in another column.

A mulatto named Walter Edwards stabbed his wife eight times at Omaha. He accused her of being unfaithful, and she left him. He asked her to come back, but she refused. He then declared she should never live with any other man, and, drawing a long poniard, stabbed her repeatedly, inflicting wounds from which she died. Edwards is in jail.

PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION

My Poor Back!

That "poor back" is held responsible for more, than its share of the sufferings of mankind. If your dog bites a man who kicks it, do you blame the dog? On the same principle the kidneys utter their protest against nervousness, impure blood, and resulting constipation. These force them to do extraordinary work in ridding the system of the poisons which are the result of effete matter retained in the blood. Then the sufferer says the back aches; the kidneys are diseased. "Not yet;" but they will be unless the nerves are strengthened, the blood purified, and the constipation removed. These are the causes of kidney troubles, and Paine's Celery Compound removes them quickly. With its tonic, purifying, and laxative effect, it also strengthens the weak kidneys, making it almost infallible in curing all diseases of the nerves and kidneys. If your hopes of cure have not been realized, try Paine's Celery Compound; it gives perfect health to all who complain of "their poor backs." Price $1.00.

MURDER OR MERCY.

A Story of To-Day.

It was half-past four, and the morning room at Minton Court was dotted with confidential groups. Huge logs blazed in the two fireplaces, but no lamps or candles had been brought in to disturb the intimacy of the twilight hour. Tea at Milton Court was always drunk by firelight on winter afternoons. "Darkness is such an aid to scandal." Lady Minton used to say; "how can we pull our neighbors to pieces in the glare of those odious lamps? Half the best things I have ever heard have been told me in the dusk."

The hour of tea was a sociable one, and the surroundings were thoroughly feminine. The morning room was furnished in that heterogeneous manner which is the characteristic of our time. There were many screens, and palms in brass pots, Indian mats and Japanese tables, Turkish divans and Smyrnese carvings, while a number of Rajon etchings, framed in black, made a sad note on the Pompeian red walls, giving the otherwise over-luxurious room that touch of studied pathos which is ever present in the complex and many-sided life of to-day. The curtains were not yet drawn, and far off, apart from the group of dainty fingers who were clustering round the tea-table and the fire, stood a young girl with her face pressed against the window. It was a cold, melancholy afteroon, and outside a heavy white fog was gathering over the frost-bitten ground, making a fine contrast to the gay and cheery scene within doors. Suddenly she turned with a cynical little laugh from the window. "What a fool I am!" said the girl to herself. "I have been standing at that cold window for exactly twenty minutes. And for what reason? Because Dr. Brooke chose to go out for a walk oves the moors on a particularly impossible day, and hasn't come back yet. Is that a reason why I should go without my tea, not to mention the awful possiblity of catching a cold in my head, and having a red nose? Oh, thanks, Capt. Egerton, I should like some tea, awfully"—and repeating the last sentence aloud, Alison Bligh came forward into the fire-light.

Even in the flickering fire-rays she revealed herself as a very striking girl. There was an unmistakable touch of sensuousness in the full lips and in the clear-cut nostrils, which were the best part of a nose which was somewhat too thick for a woman, and in the fine curves of her shoulders and bust. But intellect was not wanting, as her broad, well-marked forehead proved; nor determination, which was revealed in the square lines of her jaw and chin; nor a certain amount of ideality, which looked out of her somewhat dreamy eyes—dark, Southern eyes which were in direct contradiction to the twists of pale red-gold hair which crowned her head. In sum, a very dangerous young woman, whom Lady Minton was wont to declare she would not trust with her own husband, although Sir Francis was past 70, and a model of the conjugal virtues.

Miss Bligh felt her spirits rise suddenly as she took her place in the cheery round and fire, and she smiled when she thought of her watch by the window just now. How cold and miserable she had felt—how ridiculous to have ceded to such a sentimental impulse! That was not her way either; she who had long ago made up her mind to snatch every moment of happiness—every pleasurable emotion even—life could offer her. And then the soft voice of Lady Minton was heard saying: "Alison, when you have quite finished with Capt. Egerton and those muffins, pass them both on. And do, like a dear child, sing us something."

Miss Bligh thereupon sprang up and went to the open piano.

"I will sing you," she said gravely, "a little romance which I heard once at the Varietes. I believe it has a moral. Judic used to sing it," and striking up a quaint accompaniment, she sang some words familiar enough on the boulevards.

While the room was echoing with plaudits on her rather risky performance, the door opened and a man of about 35 came in and sat down in a rocking-chair at the far end of the room.

"Awfully good, by Jove!" cried Capt. Egerton, who was leaning on the piano. "I could have sworn it was Judic, herself, only you aren't fat, you know." The last part of the gallant captain's sentence was a tender whisper intended for Miss Bligh's ear alone, but, like many other soft speeches, was audible to the rest of the room. Dr. Brooke frowned as he moved from his seat near the door and, coming forward into the firelight, asked Lady Minton for a cup of tea.

"So glad you're back, Doctor! We all thought you were lost on Exmoor," said Lady Minton purring over her guest as she poured him out some tea.

"Yes, we were all looking forward to seeing you brought home stiffly frozen on a shutter!" cried Allison, who seemed in the highest spirits. Had she forgotten her impatient watch by the window only half an hour before?

"Ah, the gods don't love me. I shall not die young," said the Doctor, whose keen eyes were riveted on her face. Then the party broke up in to small groups, and it was either by choice or by chance that she found herself, only a few minutes later, standing alone with him at the same window at which she had watched half an hour before.

"I am glad you are back," she said at last, half-shyly, as the young man stood and gazed at her in the dusk. "Are you! You knew I was out then?"

"Yes."

"None of the others missed me, I should imagine. They were playing some game which looked uncommonly like 'kiss-in-the-ring' when I left. Were you one of that lot?"

"Oh, no. I have been in my room all the afternoon."

"Thank heaven for that!"

Alison smiles at the fervor of his tone.

"Would you have minded much if I had been 'one of that lot?"

The Doctor frowned. "I should have been rather—disappointed. I should have thought very little of you if you had."

"Well—I wasn't. But I am afraid it is not a sense of the outraged proprieties which kept me from playing 'kiss in the ring' in the hall. If it could possibly have amused me, I should have done so. I believe in amusing oneself. But somehow or other, that sort of thing doesn't entertain me. Perhaps I am too old—or not old enough; anyhow, I don't care for the infantine pastimes which are the fashion now. I suppose when I am getting on for forty I shall like them."

"No, I don't think you ever will," said Brooke, smiling down at her charming upturned face.

"But I am afraid you don't understand me," she said quickly; "you think me better than I am. I have no moral aim, no aspirations, nothing of that kind. I simply enjoy the present. I suppose, if I wanted to pose, I should call myself an epicurean. It is strange, but 'to-morrow' has absolutely no meaning for me; I believe in 'to-day.' I mean to enjoy every hour of my life. After all, what do we know of 'to-morrow?' Nothing. But we do know that roses are divine!" And pulling a hothouse flower from her waist belt, the girl pressed it, with a pretty, unconventional gesture, to her lips.

"At that rate," said the Doctor, "if you were to have some great misfortune—to lose all your money, for instance, or catch the smallpox—you would have very little to fall back upon. You might feel the want of the 'consolations of religion.'"

"No, I don't think I should. If any great unhappiness," she added dreamily, "were ever to befall me, I should not want to live. I did not ask to come into the world, and why, forsooth, should I not go when I am tired of it? Life after all, is very like a party to which some one else has insisted on our going. If we are bored, we are surely not bound to wait till the very end. We leave when we please."

Dr. Brooke looked steadily at her.

"You are a very strange girl, Miss Bligh. Not one woman in a thousand would dare to say such a thing as that. But I think you are right. There are cases when death is a release from torture, mental and bodily."

"How did we get on such a lugubrious topic?" said Alison, shivering slightly and turning away from the dark landscape.

There was a pause and then the young man said suddenly:

"Why did you sing that song just now?"

"I—don't know," said Alison with drooping eyes.

"Do you know what it means?"

"Do you?" she said, raising her eyebrows innocently.

"I walked the hospitals in Paris for two years. I understood every word."

"Oh, I am sorry. I thought, with my accent and an English audience, that I should be perfectly safe."

"Don't do it again," he said; "for heaven's sake, don't. You can't imagine how dreadful it is to see you do a thing like that."

"Thank you for saying that," he answered, gravely. "Sing something for me now, will you?"

Miss Bligh answered by moving away to the piano. Brooke stood still by the window, looking out over the snow-covered grounds and waiting to hear what she would sing. Allison's fingers strayed tentatively over the keys, as if seeking the strain which suited her mood best. Presently her clear young voice was heard in Handel's immortal air, "Lascia Ch'io Pianga."

"Handel, instead of boulevard songs"—Duncan Brooke smiled to himself—"that will do. Allison loves me. I know it—I can see it in her eyes."

II

It was a passionate yet half-paternal feeling that Dr. Brooke had for this beautiful girl; a feeling akin to that which the tiger cherishes toward its cub, and yet with a yearning tenderness, too. He felt that he would gladly have thrown away his life to save her pain, but as it was, he meant to devote his life to her pleasure. Nothing should be spared that could give her pleasure—this little epicurean who believed so devoutly in the Now! There was nothing, too, which could stand in the way of an immediate marriage. Duncan Brooke had already made a brilliant reputation and a large practice, and Alison being an orphan, with a fortune of her own, there would be no difficulties about their settling down at once. His house in Grosvenor street was a fair-sized one, and with Alison's taste in furniture and pictures, might be made one of the prettiest in London. He smiled as he saw a vision of her radiant face at the head of his dinner-table, smiling at his guests, perfect in her young matronhood, Somehow he always thought of her in connection with beautiful and pleasant things; with flowers, and picturers, and music, and the sparkle of dinner-table wit. She had told him that day that she loved roses; well, she should have roses on her table every day of the year. And then Brooke remembered that pearls were another hobby of Alison's. He would telegraph to town to-morrow for the finest necklace he could get.

That night, when Lady Minton had sent her maid away, a pink robed figure knocked at her door and knotted a pair of soft arms tight round her neck.

"My dear child, what is the matter?" she grasped in the midst of this impetuous embrace.

"It's all settled—and I'm so happy!"

"Indeed," said Lady Minton, laughing. "And may I ask who is the lucky man?"

"Oh, Dr. Brooke, of course. How can you ask?"

"My dear, all the men in the house are mad about you. I listen to their confidences—you know my way."

"Well, you shan't be bored with any more, you dear thing. Please let them know that I am the happiest woman in the world."

III.

A weak later Lady Minton and two or three of her guests stood at the hall door to see the Doctor and Miss Bligh mount the dog-cart for a drive. Lady Minton was profuse in her advice.

"Now, mind you take care of Alison, Doctor. That mare is rather frisky and the roads are slippery to-day. You've got to bring Alison back safe and sound. We don't want to have a 'case' for you down here."

The doctor smiled as Miss Bligh came down the wide oaken staircase. A week's happiness had changed a handsome girl into a young goddess. In her tight-fiting, manly garments, and the soft furs at her throat, she looked the personification of youth. Her eyes—always fine—seemed twice as large, and had acquired a soft expression which was irresistible; the cynical little laugh, which had formerly been one of her characteristics, had disappeared.

Another two minutes and the girl was snugly tucked under a fur rug on the front seat of the high dog-cart, and Brooke, touching the mare with his whip, sent her flying down the long carriage drive.

How ridiculously those people are in love with each other!" said Lady Minton, with a little sigh. "Upon my word, it is quite Acadian. I wonder how long it will last?"

"About six months, I take it," drawled Capt. Egerton; "at least I hope so. Miss Bligh won't look at any other fellow than saw-bones. But it can't last, that sort of thing. Quite uncivilized you know."

"Well they are to be married in six weeks," laughed lady Minton. "So this time next year we shall see you making the running' with the beautiful Mrs. Brooke?"

"Nothing more likely in the world," replied Capt Egerton, who had a royal idea of his own powers of fascination.

At the luncheon table two chairs were vacant. "I wonder where our two young people have got to?" said Lady Minton. "I wish Dr. Brooke would not take her these long expeditions, it makes me very uneasy."

"They are probably lunching somewhere a deux, dear Lady Minton," suggested the "frisky matron" of the party.

"I don't know where they will lunch out on Exmore—and I don't feel at all sure about that mare. She is getting a regular jade."

The afternoon closed in and there were still no signs of the girl and her lover. Tea had been brought in and Lady Minton was trying to hide her growing alarm as she chatted with guests and did the honors of the tea table.

"I am sure I heard wheels at the front door of the house," she said suddenly.

"Yes, but it is not the dog-cart, said Capt. Egerton; "those were cart-wheels I heard."

"Go out and see what it is, for goodness' sake. No carts ever come up to the court after dusk!"

The young man hurried out of the room and a minute later a scared footman came and whispered to lady Minton. Hurrying into the hall she was met by Egerton and Brooke. The Doctor's face was destitute of every vestige of color and his eyes seemed to have sunk far back into his head.

"There has been a bad accident——"

"Where is Allison," cried Lady Minton; "she is not——"

"No, not dead; but she is very seriously wounded. Can you bear the worst?"

"Take me to her, my poor darling!" wailed Lady Minton.

"We have carried her here, into Sir Francis' study; and she must not be moved any more. Don't look at her face, Lady Minton. I want you to be strong—to help me."

A motionless heap lay on the sofa, and that heap was Alison Bligh. Piteous groans came from her lips, and one side of her face was carefully bound up with a man's white silk handkerchief.

"Make up a bed quickly here. Call her maid—if she has strong nerves—to help you take of her clothes. I can tell you nothing definite till I have examined her. Bring some brandy."

These orders were briefly given by the Doctor as he hurried from the room to fetch his case of surgical instruments.

An hour later the worst was known. The girl's spine was badly injured that she would never be able to rise again. One side of her face had been so terribly crushed that she was hardly recognizable, and her sufferings were acute. She might live, the Doctor thought, but her life would be so many years of mental and bodily anguish.

IV

The house party at Minton Court broke up immediately, and by noon the next day the last carriageful of guests had swept down the drive. Silence reigned in the large rambling house, Lady Minton and Miss Bligh's maid taking their turn in the sick room. As for Duncan Brooke, he hardly left his patient's bedside. Always a reticent man, not even his hostess ever guessed what he suffered during those long days and nights of anxious watching. At night, particularly, he would let no one else sit up with her, even if he snatched an hour or two's sleep during the day. For a whole fortnight she lay almost unconscious on the bed, unable to articulate, and only showing by her low groans that she was still alive—and suffering.

Then came a change, and Alison was able to speak again. One day the Doctor was alone with her in the room where they had laid her down on the day of the accident. The great house was hushed into perfect stillness, and not a sound was to be heard but the occasional fall of a cinder on the hearth.

"Duncan," she whispered suddenly, with a very little sigh.

"What is it, my darling?" said the Doctor, bending his head to listen.

"I—I want to go to sleep."

"So you shall, dear. I will give you an opiate to-night."

"Oh, but I want to go to sleep for—always. I cannot bear it any more. It is all over for me now; all over, and I am only 22? I should go mad chained to a bed all the years I may have to live. * * * And you would learn to hate me—how could you help it? I know I am a horrible, maimed mass, although you have never let me see my face since. * * Oh, Duncan, and the pain! I cannot bear it. I always hated pain; I am sure I feel it more than other people do. And what I suffer now is inhuman! What have I done that I should have to bear this terrible agony? We would not let a dog suffer what you all look on and see me endure! It is cruel—cruel!"

"Alison, I would give my life to save you one pang."

"Would you?" she said eagerly. "I know you are brave and good. Have you the courage to help me now? Oh, Duncan! when you give me that chloral to-night give me enough to send me to sleep for always. No one will ever know. Oh, my darling, do me one last service!"

"I cannot do it," he whispered back, some inward voice telling him, even as he spoke the words, that here was the merciful euthanasia for this poor maimed girl. He knew that her life—even if she live !—would be henceforward a martyrdom, and that never again would she rise from her "mattress grave."

As night closed in Alison grew worse. She was evidently suffering frightfully. "I shall not leave her an instant to-night," said Brooks to Lady Minton, who stood with scared, white face at the bedside. "I cannot tell what may happen," he added at the door, having persuaded his hostess to take an hour or two's rest. "She might succumb now—from the shock—or she might live for years. I shall give her a strong opiate tonight she must have sleep."

"Thank heaven for one thing," said Lady Minton "and that is that you are here in the house. Think if we had been obliged to rely on the local practioner! It is simply a mercy that you are here!"

"A mercy!" repeated the Doctor gravely. "Yes; perhaps it is."

When the day dawned the house was all astir. Swiftly moving figures hurried up and down stairs, and the Doctor, meeting Lady Minton in the cold, gray light, at the door of the sick room, took her hand and led her away.

"Allison is gone," he whispered. "She passed away last night without pain. I was with her; she died in my arms."

"Poor darling! It is a merciful release," sobbed the kind-hearted woman.

"Yes, a merciful release," repeated Brooke, pressing his hostess' hand.

Next day Lady Minton went with a sinking heart to the Doctor's door. He had locked himself in ever since Alison's death, and had refused all food on the plea that he wished to sleep; but she found him sitting dressed at his writing table, having obviously never been to bed. Some medical books and sheets of manuscript lay about, he seemed to be writing.

"I am so pained to speak of anything connected with this awful affair, but you know there are the usual formalities to be observed. Poor Alison had no near relations living, so we must arrange all the last sad offices. Here is the Registrar's certificate. Will you, as you were her only medical attendant, fill in the—cause of death.

"The cause of death!" cried Brooke, rising from his chair, "I—I—cannot say—how should I know?" he shouted, throwing up his hands.

The next instant he was lying in a senseless heap on the floor. * * *

Six months after, the following paragraph appeared in an evening paper:

"A HERO OF THE HOSPITAL.—Once more one of our most eminent physicians has proved that heroism is not confined to the winners of the Victoria Cross. It is with the deepest regret that we record the untimely death of Dr. Duncan Brooke of Grosvenor street, physician to the Whitechapel Hospital. It appears that an impatient—a boy of eleven years of age—was suffering from acute diphtheria. The physicians agreed that there was a chance of saving the child's life if the operation of tracheotomy could be successfully performed. It will be remembered that in this operation the putrid and poisonous matter has to be sucked by the operator through a tube. In spite of the opposition of the other doctors, Dr. Brooke insisted on performing the operation, which was highly successful, the boy being now nearly convalescent. Dr. Brooke (who, it appears, received a severe mental shock some six months ago) was taken ill shortly afterward, and expired this morning in the hospital. Deceased was widely known and highly respected.—[E. Hepworth Dickson, in the Woman's World.

Superstition Rife To-day.

From the Buffalo Express.

People are wont to bost of the enlightment of this age and laugh at the superstitions of their forefathers But it is quite safe to say that superstition is as rife to-day as it ever was, the only difference being that now people are ashamed to acknowledge their weaknesses. Said a real estate man: There is nothing which gives a building a lasting black eye quicker than a report that it is or was haunted. The slamming of a door, the rattling of a window, knocking down of a tin pan by pussy cat are all the work of ghosts in such buildings. And the worst of it is that people are just as afraid of a new building erected on the site of a haunted one as they are of the haunted one itself.

Something from Nothing.

There is no use of wasting time and money in trying to get something from nothing. Every time you try it, the result will be 0—1=never. It makes no difference whether the attempt is made through the medium of steam, electricity, or any other method of transmitting power; the result is zero every time.

The same result also appears when a poor workman is set at work on a job he is incapable of doing. He does his best, but it is 0—1 again and the result is the same.

Sometimes the experiment is tried in the line of perpetual motion, then the result is, invariably, pocket minus dollars equals experience. Aside from the large cases where such folly is shown, there are always hundred of little side issues where the same folly is continually being shown.

A HUNDRED YEARS A HERO!

How Seth Warner Won a Wife and Became Famous.

Colonel Seth Warner, of Vermont, the famous hero of the Revolutionary war, was a leading fighter for the Hampshire grants.

These titles were disputed by the State of New York, and its authorities obtained an edict of the King of England in their favor. The settlers were stung by the supposed injustice. This state of things brought Colonel Seth Warner to the front. With Ethan Allen and others he actively opposed every effort of the New York state authorities to enforce possession, and finally he, with Allen and others, were outlawed and a price put on their heads!

To circumvent New York, it was necessary that some one should go into that state and gain required information. Col. Warner, assuming for safety the name of "Dr. Howard," undertook this perilous and romantic journey.

While on his way home he stopped at a country inn, where an old gentleman and daughter were stormbound. The father fell ill and the daughter called upon Col. Warner, who, with his wide knowledge of simple remedies, successfully treated the "old man," and he finally won this devoted woman for a wife.

Such incidents were not uncommon in those years. When the doctor was not easily reached, months of sickness, and even life were often saved by some unprofessional friend versed in the use of simple herbs and roots. The health of early settlers and their powers of endurance convince us that such medicines did only good and left no poison in the blood to work as much injury to the system as would the disease itself.

In time of peace the colonel was in constant demand for his knowledge of simple remedies and their power over disease. But it was left to another of his name of the present age to give to the public what was then used with such positive success.

Warner for over a hundred years has shared with Ethan Allen the admiration of the American people.

Colonel Seth Warner belongs to a family of wide distinction; no less than eight members thereof won fame in the regular practice of medicine.

Looking to the adoption by the people of this generation of the old time simple remedies, his direct descendant, H. H. Warner, the well-known proprietor of Warner's safe cure, for many years has been experimenting with old time roots and herbs formulæ and, his search having been finally rewarded with success, he gives the world the result. These recipes and formulæ in other days accomplished great things because they were purely vegetable and combined simply so as to cure the disease indicated, without injury to the system. In harmony with their old time character, we learn that he proposes to call them Warner's Log Cabin remedies, using as a trade-mark an old-fashioned American log cabin: We understand that he intends to put forth a "sarsaparilla," for the blood, the sarsaparilla itself being but one of a number of simple and effective elements; "Log Cabin hops and buchu," a general stomach tonic and invigorator: "Log Cabin cough and consumption remedy," "Warner's Log Cabin hair tonic;" a preparation for that universal disease catarrh, called "Log Cabin rose cream;" "Warner's Log Cabin plasters;" and "Warner's Log Cabin liver pills," which are to be used in connection with the other remedies, or independently as required.

Warner's safe remedies are already standards of the most pronounced scientific value in all parts of the world, and we have no doubt the Log Cabin remedies, for the diseases they are intended to cure, will be of equal merit, for Mr. Warner has the reputation of connecting his name with no preparation that is not meritorious.

Eating Horse Meat.

To be cut into big steaks and served as fillet of beef at a dinner at the Philadelphia club was the fate of Pandora, the famous steeplechaser. Pandora was shot because of incurable lameness. After she had died without a struggle the choicest meat was cut from her bones and taken to the cuisine of the Philadelphia club, where the chief was sworn to secrecy and the meat was disguised as a joint of beef. Dr. Rush S. Huidekoper, who bought Pandora thirteen years ago, gave a dinner at the Philadelphia club and one of the dishes on the menu read "Filet a la Pandora." Nobody knew except Dr. Huidekoper that the course was a part of poor old Pandora's body. The guests supposed the dish was named in honor of the old steeplechaser, whom they had seen take ditch and fence and come in the winner of many an exciting race. After the filet had been eaten and pronounced very toothsome by the guests Dr. Huidekoper remarked that he was glad of his guests' appreciation of his favorite horse, "for," he said, "you have just eaten her."

The guests looked at each other in amazement, and after a short interval of deathly silence there was a roar of laughter. Then in an instant every one seemed to remember Pandora as he had seen her at the last meet, and in reverential silence the company rose to their feet, lifted their glasses to their lips and sipped in solemn silence to the memory of the old gray mare they had just devoured.

Ought to Fill Their Bags With Something

From the Chicago News.

The Emperors of Germany and Austria, the Prince of Wales, and two or three more royal sportsmen, are chasing bears, chamois, and other wild beasts in the hope of shooting something or other. So far they have not succeeded in killing anything, and it begins to look as if they would have to buy a few dozen Welsh rabbits and clay pigeons on their way home in order to fill their game bags.

Moral: Read Your Bible.

From the New York Sun.

An old acquaintance of Tom Ochiltree told a characteristic story about that celebrated man which a group of politicians listened to with interest.

"It was about 1855 or 1856," he said, "when the Indians were raiding the Texas frontier, that a company called the Texas Rangers was formed for the purpose of fighting the redskins and driving them from the border. Tom and I grew up together, and once on a Fourth of July he delivered the oration and one of our chronies read the Declaration of Independence. Tom's father was an eminent lawyer down there and was called Buffalo Head, because of the large thinking-box he carried above his shoulders. He was a Whig leader, and several times was his party's candidate for governor, but was always defeated.

"Tom joined the rangers, and just before he started with them for the frontier his father—who was not a notably pious man, however—handed the young fellow a bible.

"'Take this bible, Tom,' said the old gentleman, 'and it won't do you any harm to read it sometimes.'

"The young ranger thanked his father for the gift, and soon left with his company for the front. The rangers were about nine months in the service when they returned. When Tom's father met the lad he said:

"'Well, Tom, I suppose you read your bible while you were out there?'

"'Yes, father,' replied the young soldier, 'and I have brought it back with me.'

"Judge Ochiltree took the book and opened the pages picked out a $20 bill and put it in his pocket, while Tom looked on in utter astonishment and chagrin. Then turning the leaves over the old gentlemen took out two other $20 bills, which he also put in his pocket. Just what Tom's thoughts were can well be imagined. During the latter part of his services on the road he hadn't a cent, and was obliged to deny himself many mental and physical comforts which, without money, were unobtainable."

Result of Fast Travelling.

A correspondent of the London Times, writing on the subject of the daily race between two fast trains to the north, says: "There is one point of which I have seen no notice taken, the increased wear and tear mentally and bodily of the driver and stoker on these special trains. A friend of one of the drivers told me that he saw a marked effect on his apparent health. The driver told him his anxiety was greatly increased. On one occasion his stoker, who had gone along the engine to oil a valve, became paralyzed with fear, so that he could not move forwards or backwards. The driver had to leave his place and follow his stoker and seize his hand, and so they regained the standing place. The distance run are so great and the pace so rapid that any oiling, etc., is done with increased risk. The force of the wind is so great that when the stoker creeps along the footplate alongside of the engine he has to hold on by the rail like grim death, and has been carried off his feet."

Who Cares Anyhow?

The cold matter of fact is that Great Britain can not spare Canada, and Canada does not want to be spared. Between the two this country will have to worry along some way without that much additonal territory. There is no occasion for hanging our harps on the willows by reason of it, either. The great mass of the American people don't care a rye straw whether Canada is in or out of this Union, so long as she behaves herself.

REPUBLICAN GOSPEL.

A Spoils Candidate.

Mr. Cleveland was never a reformer in any way but on paper, and long ago ceased to be even that. He is now running as a spoils candidate pure and simple.—From the Buffalo Express.

The Veto Prodigy.

There is another difference in presidential candidates; some of them are elected and some are not. This is a good year for the popular candidate whom the people delight to honor, against the man who can veto an orphan with one hand tied behind him.—From the New York Tribune.

A Record Unequaled.

Kansas City Journal: It is a most remarkable thing that Gen. Harrison should have been making speeches for three months without having "laid himself open" once to his watchful opponents. No other public speaker in the country has ever equaled that record.

The Difference.

In Philadelphia, a protection city, 179,000 houses are owned by working people—says Hon. Charles O'Neill.

In Leeds, England, a free trade city, population 320,000, not one laboring man or mechanic owns his home—says the chief of police.—Indianapolis Journal.

An Election Costs Too Much.

"What I want to know," said the patriotic Mississippian, as he bit off a hunk of tobacco and crunched it savagely, "is whether this yer bill of Congressman Mills reduces the tariff on shotguns or not. If it doesn't I'm agin it. Why, dang it all, it costs too blamed much to carry an honest election in this country!"—From the Chicago Tribune.

Vilas and Dickinson.

New York Sun, dem.: We are glad to see the cabinet on the stump. It is a manly assertion of the inalienable right of every American citizen, even if he be an officeholder. But when the cabinet gets on the stump at the west it ought not to talk in such a way as to hurt the ticket at the east. Better stay in Washington.

This and That.

The Mills bill would leave the farmer practically helpless against the encroachment of foreign rivals. The Republican Senate substitute would preserve all the existing barriers against destructive competition and interpose others equally effective where the interests of our agriculturists require such protection.—Troy Times.

Where He Belongs.

St. Louis Globe-Democrat: The democrats get few recruits from the republican or any other party. Consequently they are justified in their shouts of triumph at the announcement that ex-Secretary McCulloch will vote for Cleveland. Mr. McCulloch was always a free trader and he should have gone over to the democrats years ago.

Why Not?

St Louis Globe-Democrat: If the democrats in congress are honestly anxious to make food cheaper, why do they not accept the republican proposition to reduce the sugar duties to the amount of $28,000,000? That would be a direct saving to every family in the country, and at the same time the surplus would be lessened without doing any particular harm to the interests of domestic labor and enterprise.

The Fact That Knocks them Out.

The cry of the free traders is that everything is cheaper in free-trade England than here, and that the same policy would make clothing and manufactured articles cheaper for our workingmen. Why, then, have 126,247 emigrants come from Great Brittain to this country since last New Year's day? If living is cheaper there than here, should not people go from this country to England?—Toledo Blade.

The President—Music? I should think he had music enough from the mugwump organs around him. But what are you sending him?

Cleveland Has Not a Personal Friend.

Mr. Cleveland lives in the peculiar situation of not having in all this broad land one single devoted, earnest, cordial, personal friend. There is not one man who can truly and comprehensively say that he likes Mr. Cleveland. Such is the effect of the president's personal character and manners upon those who come in contact with him; and those who come into the closest contact are those who like him least.—New York Sun.

Passing Strange.

Since January 1, 1888, 126,247 persons have left Great Britain and Ireland to settle in the United States. It is singular, if everything is so cheap in that free trade paradise, that so many people leave it for this "blasted" protection country. The total population of the British Isles is 36,000,000. Almost one half of one per cent. have emigrated to this country within eight months. And yet they can buy carpets there cheaper than here!—Chicago Journal.

A Chicago Man's Vow.

"My son," said a Chicago man to his eldest boy, "Two months ago I made a vow that I would never shave again until Grover Cleveland should be re-elected President. I returned a few mornings ago from a trip through New York, Connecticut and Indiana, and I have just heard from Vermont. Here is my razor. Keep it always, my son, in memory of your father. I shall never need it again."—Chicago Tribune.

Where the German Vote Will Go.

The supposition that most of the citizens who have been naturalized since the last presidential election will vote for Harrison and Morton and the protection of home industry is perfectly correct. These people appreciate the benefit which they and the whole country owe to protective tariff. Their experience and comparison with their position in the old and new fatherland will teach them that to vote with the Democrats and free trade would be the lowering of their own wages.—Cincinnati Freie Presse (German).

Free Trade or Nothing.

So long as Col. Henry Watterson goes around the country making speeches for Grover Cleveland and the Mills bill voters should keep in mind these choice extracts from his editorials in the Louisville Courier-Journal:

"We demand tariff reform and we set our faces in the direction of Free Trade."

"The conflict between Free Trade and Protection is irrepressible and must be fought out to the bitter end. We spit upon compromises and propose neither to ask nor to give quarter."

"The Democratic party, except in the person of imbeciles hardly worth mentioning, is not upon the fence. It is a Free-trade party or it is nothing."

"The black flag is up. No quarter will be asked and no quarter will be given."

Mr. Brice's Little Song.

How dear to my heart is the vote of Old Texas, Old Texas that nothing can swerve from our side, Old Texas that's solid and sure for the party Though the party enemy come like a fast flowing tide; Old Texas where shot guns discuss public question, And where the six shooter speaks up sharp and quick, Where they monuments raise to the late Col. Bowie, and voting is apt to make niggers quite sick! The old solid Texas, that certain Texas, that moss covered Texas where Bourbons are thick!

New York and New Jersey they're gone from us surely, And so has Connecticut faded away; Indiana for us is a snare and delusion, And the rest of the north, it was always astray; But there's Texas, old Texas, down there in the corner, And with heart overflowing to thee will I sing. As I ponder and fancy with fond recollection, And think in November what comfort you'll bring! That solid old Texas, that moss grown old Texas, that dead sure old Texas, Democracy's king.—New York Tribune.

The Issue.

CLEARLY SET FORTH BY MR. MORTON.

It is difficult, however, in a political campaign to fix popular attention on more than one issue, and in the pending election every voter in the United States clearly sees that the controlling question is whether the protective tariff duties now in force shall be so reduced as to destroy their efficiency, or whether these duties shall be retained with such modifications and adjustments as shall better adapt them to the great end of protecting the vast and important industries of the whole country.

The Republican platform, while recognizing the necessity of reducing the revenue declares that this reduction must not be made at the expense of those industries and of American labor.

The American people have now enjoyed the protective system for a longer continuous period than ever before in the history of the National government. The result is that for more than a quarter of a century they have realized a degree of industrial and financial prosperity unprecedented in this country and never equalled in any other—Hon. L. P. Morton's Letter of Acceptance.

Ten Reasons Why I am a Republican.

J. ELLEN FOSTER.

I am a Republican by hereditary influence, past environments, and present convictions. Because:—

First—The Republican party in the past has stood for all that is liberal and progressive in legislation.

Second—The Republican party freed the slave.

Third—The pronounced and emphatic legislation on moral questions has come most largely from Republican legislators.

Fourth—The Republican party has always been the champion of protection—protection of the citizen, protection to the negro, protection to the ballot-box, protection to the wage earner, protection to the wage payer, and now, right in line with its past professions and performances, it declares protection to the home.

Fifth—The friends of the liquor interest in the ranks of the Republican party are few and far between.

Sixth—The Republican party has stood for the most advanced temperance legislation which the people demanded, and in very many States has made open declarations of enmity against the saloon.

Seventh—The Republican party deals with conditions of the temperance work, not theories. The ideal is not always attainable; it is better that the majority of the great, struggling, groaning mass should gain one inch of altitude than that a few should, by separating themselves into a "holier-than-thou" party, attain supernal heights.

Eighth—The Republican party, by reason of its powerful position in this country, is able to consistently promise the redemption of its pledges, while the so-called Prohibition party, even if the the sincerity of its pledges be admitted, cannot, for many years at least, fulfill any one of them.

Ninth—The best types of American manhood are represented in the persons of Benjamin Harrison and Levi P. Morton.

Tenth—The record of the Republican party proves it to be made up of men out of whose brain and heart reforms have come in the past and are likely to come in the future.

The Parrot and the Old Man.

The Bowery parrot was enjoying the sun, as the cage had been placed on a three-legged stool on the sidewalk in front of the abode of this remarkable bird. A man, evidently a wage earner, of 60, was passing, and paused as the bird said in its most insinuating way:

"The tariff is a tax."

"Now that won't do," said the man of 60, "for I know better. A few nights ago I heard a Democratic orator say I was 'taxed nearly 100 per cent. on my blankets.' Not believing this statement I looked up some old bills which I had among my papers and found that blankets, such as my son, who was recently married, paid $1.90 and $2.58 for, cost me in 1860 $3.50 and $3.75. Further inquiry brought out the fact that blankets that sell to-day for $1.02 sold in 1860 for $2. The blanket that sells now for $1.45 sold in 1860 for $2.50 The blanket that sells now for $1.31 sold in 1860 for $2.25. The blanket that sells now for $4.35 sold for $7.50 in 1860. The blanket that sells for $5.85 now, sold for $10 in 1860. The blanket that sells now for $6.80 sold for $13 in 1860. Come old bird how do you get over these facts?"

"The tariff is a tax," screamed the bird, plucking a feather from his head by way of emphasizing the wisdom of his conclusion.—N. Y. Press.

Democracy's Last Resort.

The information is sent out on reliable authority that the Democrats are preparing to resort during the closing week of the campaign to methods of falsehood, fraud and forgery in the most unblushing and unscrupulous manner. The information comes from reliable Democratic sources, and can be depended upon as true, so far as Democratic inventions go. The tide of political drift has been steadily away from the Democratic party. Each week of the campaign has witnessed new accessions to the Republican ranks, and corresponding gloom and depression at Democratic headquarters. Grown desperate by the prospect of defeat, the Democratic managers are preparing to employ the most infamous methods that can be devised. They will wait until the campaign is nearly over, so late that they can hope that their despicable plans cannot be exposed, and then will rely upon foul means to secure what they cannot hope to get by fair ones. It is intimated that forgeries will be put forth beside which the Morey letter forgery of 1880 will seem a trivial affair. It should not be forgotten that the chairman of the Democratic National Committee is the same man who, as chairman in 1880, boldly proposed to buy the electoral vote of Oregon. It should not be forgotten that the author of the Morey letter was a Democrat, hired by Democratic money. It should not be forgotten that the Democratic is the only party that ever has attempted to carry elections by fraud and violence, and then boasted of the fact. It should not be forgotten that having had a taste of the delights of power, the Democrats are more fierce for its continuance than they were for its possession four years ago. And remembering these things, it behooves all good citizens to be on their guard from now till election against any desperate measures which the Democrats may undertake. Republican speakers and Republican papers should warn their hearers and readers to be prepared for a flood of Democratic forgeries and falsehoods in the closing week of the campaign. The fact that Democratic sensations and pretended discoveries are held back till then, should be in itself evidence of their falseness. The people know by this time the issue between the parties. Any attempt to spring startling sensations of a personal nature near the close of the campaign should be promptly denounced as forgeries and falsehoods. Such roorbacks we have reason to believe are being held back for that purpose. Let the people therefore be on their guard. If prepared for such displays of Democratic desperation, they will not be deceived. The prospects are very bright for Republican success. Let every Republican speaker warn the people against the desperate schemes of the opposition, and by being forewarned they will be forearmed.—Iowa State Register.

The Rich Paid It.

In triumphant italics the New York World asks: "Who paid the $20,729,000 in duties collected upon $44,000,000 worth of woolen goods imported and consumed in this country last year?"

Persons who were abundantly able to pay it. On Brussels carpets and fancy rugs, both luxuries, there was paid half a million; on expensive cloaks and shawls such as only the rich wear, $1,000,000; on cloths which, when made up, are worn only by persons who can afford to pay from $50 to $75 a suit, $7,000,000; on dress goods which only the rich could wear if there were no duty, $18,000,000; on yarns which sell here at from 70 cents to $1.50 a pound, $1,000,000; on the expensive worsteds for fancy things, $3,000,000. Here went $26,000,000 of the duty for things which the person in average circumstances could not afford even if there were no duty. The people who use them can afford to pay for them.

The rich paid these duties. They are luxuries. Except in the German yarns, the United States can supply all necessary woolen goods for this country and things that are not necessary but are luxuries ought to be taxed for the revenues of the government.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Selling American Prosperity.

John Finerty, the eloquent Irish orator of Chicago, delivered a speech in Brooklyn a few days ago, in the course of which he said: "I would be ashamed of a man who would sell the prosperity of a country for a couple of cheap blankets."

The Democrats are trying to retain their hold upon the Government by endeavoring to persuade the farmers of Indiana to sell the prosperity of the United States for the difference in price between an American and an English blanket. They say that if the Mills bill were to become a law blankets would be cheaper than they are now, and with this argument they hope to induce the Indiana farmers to join them in their war against the protected industries of America.

The true American is he who cares more for the prosperity of his country than he does for the pittance that he might save in the price of blankets if the Mills bill were to become a law. Protection is the American policy. It is based upon the theory that the first duty of the Government is to consider the welfare of the people of this country, regardless of what the effect may be upon the people of England. This Government was not made for England's benefit. But the Democrats are trying to twist it and turn it in such a way as to make it more beneficial to English than American manufacturers.

This is the war upon the protected industries of the United States upon which one of their leaders says they have entered. If they had true American spirit, they would stand by their own people and their own country regardless of what the Cobden Club might think or say.

Workingmen, Attention!

The father of the Mills free trade bill, R. Q. Mills of Texas, in a speech at East St. Louis, Ill., September 25th, said:

"When we will put our own intelligent and skillful and productive labor in this country upon a plane of equality with the laborers of all other countries."

This is the ultimate aim and purpose of the present free trade crusade.

It means putting our steel-workers on an equality with the 60-cent a day steel-workers of Belgium.

It means putting our millers on an equality with the 47-cent a day millers of the great flour-producing centre of Europe, Buda-Pesth.

It means putting our paper-makers on an equality with the 50 to 55-cent a day paper-makers of Belgium, Norway and Sweden, who now send large quantities of paper to this country annually, notwithstanding the protective tariff.

It means placing the weavers in our cotton mills upon an equality with those of Alsace-Lorraine, who work from twelve to fourteen hours a day for 51 cents on the average; with those of England who receive 77 cents a day, and of Italy who receive 25 cents a day.

It means putting our woolen mill operatives on a level with the 81-cent woolen workers of England.

It means putting our flax, linen and hemp workers on an equality with the 50-cent a day operatives in these industries in England.

It means putting our boot and shoemakers on an equality with those of England, who earn 81 cents a day, and of continental Europe, who earn from 50 to 80 cents a day.

It means putting our masons and carpenters on a level with the $1.10 labor of these trades in England, and 50 to 70-cent a day wages of Europe.

It means placing our machine blacksmiths on a level with those of Scotland, who earn a $1.08 a day.

It means placing our first-class machinists on a level with those of Scotland, who earn $1.20 a day, and of continental Europe, who earn 64 cents a day.

It means that our printers shall work for 80 cents a day as in England.

It means that laborers about our factories, shops and public works shall toil day in and day out as they do in England for 72 cents a day, and on the Continent for 25 to 50 cents a day

It means that our rolling-mill men shal work for 57 cents a day and our iron moulders for 80 cents as they do in Europe.

It means that our wives and children shall go into the shop, the factory and the field and work with the men from early morn till late at night, as they do in every country of Europe.

It means that our wage—earners shall dwell in hovels and crowded tenements, and live on soup and black bread and scarcely ever taste meat, as they do in Europe.

Workingmen, this is what R. Q. Mills, the democratic free traders will do for you if they can carry the next election and inaugurate Cleveland's tariff policy. How do you like the prospects?—Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

Married in a Tree.

Miss Miranda Ellsworth and Jeremiah Simpson, a couple engaged to be married, quarreled while attending a dance in Elisha Crandall's farm-house in Connecticut. During the night Rev. Mr. Jay, the circuit minister, arrived, and in order to enliven the proceedings took off his coat and played a fiddle for the dancers. About 4 o'clock in the morning the company dispersed and Rev. Mr. Jay, who had noticed the quarrel between the couple, determined to walk home with them in order to effect a reconciliation.

While they were passing a field a ferocious Texan steer charged upon them. Simson was the first to see the beast and took refuge in a tree near by, closely followed by Miss Miranda and the minister. The latter gave the young lady a boost into a second tree and himself climed a third. They remained in this predicament for half an hour, when the couple, badly frightened at the fierce actions of the animal and fearing death, asked the minister to marry them. Accordingly Mr. Jay read the marriage ceremony from his impromptu pulpit in the tree, while the couple with great difficulty joined hands from their unpleasant positions. A farmer's wagon passed by soon and the three descended and went home.

The Loyal Legion of the United States held its fourth annual meeting in Philadelphia. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Commander-in-chief, Rutherford B. Hayes of Ohio will fill the vacancy caused by the death of Gen. Sheridan. Senior vice commander-in-chief, Senator Joseph R. Hawley of Connecticut, junior vice commander-in-chief, Judge Walter Q. Gresham of Indiana.

WM. R. MERRIAM.

The Record of a Gallant, Honest and Fearless Official. Unbroken Pledges, Faithfully Kept Promises, Noble Convictions, and

When on the first Tuesday of 1887 the Republican members of the present House of Representatives chose for their presiding officer the Hon. Wm. R. Merriam, of St. Paul their action was certainly viewed with a great deal of apprehension in different and especially in the agricultural portions of our State. Two years before, with the Hon. John L. Gibbs as speaker, a new era of antimonopoly legislation had been inaugurated; and while the railroad and grain inspection laws o 1885 proved themselves meritorious, it had nevertheless been discovered that there were still many defects that enabled the corporations to evade the real and proper intents of the law. The people demanded that these defects be remedied and corrected so that the law could be enforced and certain abuses and evasions thereof made impossible. This is what agriculturists of our State demanded of the last legislature, and it is needless to say that they were somewhat disappointed when they heard that a St. Paul banker had been chosen to fill the very important position of Speaker. And without mistake the people had good reasons to be apprehensive. Their experience with men in high official positions, of similar vocations as that of Mr. Merriam in the past, coupled together with the fact of gross misrepresentation of Mr. Merriam's character by a portion of the state press, had given rise to prejudice which was very difficult to obliterate. But when the people expected to witness a repetition of former experiences, in this instance they were certainly pleasantly disappointed. Instead of bringing his influence and power as Speaker to bear in favor of monopolies, Mr. Merriam soon proved to the farmers and laboring people, that in him they had a firm and steadfast friend, and that all fair legislation demanded by them would have in Wm. R. Merriam a willing and able champion.

Unquestionably in all legislative bodies the complexion of the different committees shapes the legislation. This every body knows and no one can deny. And right here is where the foresight, fidelity, honest and executive capability of a presiding officer can be ascertained. A legislator of the monopoly stripe on an antimonopoly committee, a committee that would be expected to work out and report measures checking the grasping power of monopoly, or a working majority of such alleged friends of monopoly on any such committee, would certainly seriously embarrass good legislation or even make it practically impossible.

Now how was it with Mr. Merriam in this respect? The committee of most importance to the agriculturists of this State was certainly the Committee on Railroads. These corporations had gradually extended their powers until their extortions became unbearable.

The people uncompromisingly demanded that the statutes be so amended that they be made amendable to the common law, and that freight and passenger rates be reasonable and in accordance with the Republican platform of 1886, which declared for reasonable rates according to the capital actually invested, and not on fictitious and watered stock. No man in the State had done more to instruct and show the people how they had been plundered by these corporations than the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, and thus incurred the combined enmity and hostility of the corporations on one side, when on the other hand he had gained the admiration and confidence of the people. It is needless to say that of all the members of the present House of Representatives no man could have been made a member of the committee on Railroads that was as obnoxious to the Railroad monopolists as Ignatius Donnelly.

It is also needless to assert that if the combined lobbying power and influence of these corporations could have prevented it, however would have been a member of this important committee.

And still Mr Merriam, in obedience to the wishes of the people, and actuated by a desire to see justice done, appointed Mr. Donnelly as the chairman of the Committee on Railroads; appointed him to a position where he could shape such legislation as was needed, and gave him as associates on that committee men who like himself were deeply interested in the welfare of the people. The committee on railroads consisted of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. Donnelly, Barker, Bjorge, Halvorson, Shoemaker, Green, Hoppin, Comstock, Seratson, Howard, Prosser Knox, Hurd, Teubert and Skinner. (Journal of the House, p. 22.)

Most of these gentlemen had identified themselves with laboring to free the people from plunderings of merciless corporate power, and several of them were members of the "Farmers Alliance."

Their task in shaping railroad legislation was not an easy one; the corporations fought for their self established privileges with a stubbornness worthy of a better cause.

Every measure of importance referred to this committee had to run the gauntlet of corporate condemnation, derision and ridicule. But the committee, under the careful and vigilant leadership of Mr. Donnelly, proved itself equal to the emergency, and all attempts to frustrate the object of the committee were in vain.

Conspicuous among the measures referred to this committee and reported to the house was H. F. 238. "A bill for an act to fix maximum charges upon the transportation of wheat and its products upon railroad lines in the State of Minnesota," introduced by Mr. Donnelly on January 25, 1887, and defeated in the House after having been favorably reported from the committee on February 16. This bill, if it had become a law, would have saved thousands to the producer, and when Mr. Donnelly upon the defeat of the bill, charged that corrupt influences had been brought to bear in securing its defeat, and moved for a committee to investigate such alleged corruption, the Speaker appointed as such committee Messrs. Donnelly, Barker, Buffum, Reese and Powers, (J. of H. p. 472) and in announcing the committee made a special request that their investigation be "thorough" and that they "SPARE NO ONE, BUT LET THE TRUTH BE KNOWN." This request of the Speaker was strictly observed, and the report of the committee created a sensation. (J. of H. pp. 679, 680.)

In the appointment of this committee the legislature and the people have the best evidence of the sincerity of Mr. Merriam to "let the truth be known." While it would have been an easy matter for him to select a whitewashing committee, consisting of opponents of the bill in question, he did not; but on the other hand, of the five gentlemen comprising the committee four had voted therefor and been earnest advocates of the same. (J. of H. p. 437.) Even Mr. Barker, who voted against the bill, was during the sessions of the investigating committee, always with the other members in trying to conscientiously sift and investigate the charges of corruption.

The committee also considered and reported favorably H. F. No. 3. "A bill for the taxation of Railroad Companies," which bill was passed by both branches. (J. of H. p. 198, J. of S. p. 697.)

Among the important senate bills referred to the committee and reported favorably and passed by the House were S. F. No. 8, "an act relative to the issuing of false, fraudulent and part paid and part unpaid shares of the stock of railroad companies, and providing a penalty therefor," (J. of H., pp. 745, 782, 838); also S. F. No. 16, "an act to define the liabilities of railroad companies in relation to damages sustained by their employees, (J. of H. pp. 187, 356, 430); also S. F. No. 557, "an act to regulate common carriages, and creating the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of the State of Minnesota, and defining the duties of such Commission in relation to common carriers." (J. of H., pp. 652, 783, 839, 874).

This act was passed to remedy certain defects and omissions of the railroad law of 1885, the principal amendments being that of confering upon the commission, the power to establish reasonable maximum freight and passenger rates on the railroads in the States in certain cases. (Sec. 8, Chap. 10, G. L. 1887.

To give this privilege to the commission was a universal request among the shippers and producers. On the whole the new railroad law of 1887, if properly and honestly enforced, will give the people all the protection from the encroachments of the roads that they need. But it must be enforced, and to accomplish this we need a courageous commission appointed by a courageous governor; and the man that appointed a legislative committee that reported such an act will, also, if called upon, see that the law is strictly enforced.

It would make a lengthy document to enumerate all the meritorious legislation passed by the late session of the legislature, but we will mention a few more. Of the greatest interest to the agricultural and working classes were H. F. No. 2, and H. F. No. 45. Both of these are constitutional amendments to be voted upon the coming election. The first "in relation to freedom of markets," (J. of H. pp. 28, 14, 43, 109, 198, 886,) and the second "to protect the rights of working men and women in certain cases," (J. of H. pp. 28, 106, 160, 311). Another constitutional amendment to be voted upon this fall is H. F. No. 750, extending the legislative session from sixty to ninety days. All these laws were urgently demanded by the farming and laboring classes, opposed by the corporations and by the lobbying power of the cities. And in all the preliminary and subsequent struggles to secure the passage of these laws Mr. Merriam steadfastly and courageously cast his lot with those who were working with this in view; and when he had to choose in standing by the cities or by the country, in every instance was he found on the side of the latter. One of the most important bills introduced in the House was H. F. No. 1, "relating to the interest on money," introduced by Mr. Donnelly, (J. of H. pp. 14, 74, 188, 780). This bill proposed to reduce the legal rate of interest from ten to seven per cent. When the bill came in committee of the whole it would certainly have been defeated had not Mr. Merriam left the chair and by his conciliatory and fair propositions induced the members to agree on a reduction to eight per cent. Here we have an example of unselfishness rarely equalled, and certainly never in the annals of the legislative history of Minnesota.

Here Mr. Merriam proved conclusively that a man can be a banker and still be a man and friend of the people. While the prospects of continuing to charge usurious rates of interest led many a capitalist astray in the last legislature and finally secured the defeat of the bill referred to above. Mr. Merriam stood staunchly on the side of those who made such a gallant fight against usury, and the plunderings effected thereby. A man's actions always tell more than his words, and we see a man disregard his own financial interest and boldly step to our side in the battle against monopoly and oppression, we have a true and powerful friend; one whom we can trust in all the emergencies that the high office of governor can throw upon his shoulders.

Another bill of the greatest interest to the producer that was passed by the House was the so-called "William 20 per cent reduction bill." It provided for a twenty per cent reduction of freight rates on all roads in the State, except in certain cases, and had it become a law, would have saved millions to the producer. Unfortunately the Senate failed to pass the bill.

Then again all attempts of the warehouse men and grain dealers to amend the grain laws of 1885 so as to bond country elevators proved futile, owing to Mr. Merriam having appointed on the committee on grain and warehouse inspection an aggregation of men that stood firm and sacredly guarded the interests of the producer. "Country elevators must not be bonded," so said the platform of the "Farmers Alliance" of 1886, and Speaker Merriam appointed his grain inspection committee accordingly, and thus the good work of that committee began in 1885 was carried on and maintained.

Most of the above measures are only of direct importance to farmers, and all of them at all stages had the hearty support of Mr. Merriam. Now a word of reference in relation to a measure that concerns wage-workers, mechanics and laboring men in general. The Republican platform of 1886 declared against convict labor coming in competition with free labor, and in accordance therewith the House passed H. F. No. 14, "An act regulating the employment of convict labor." (J. of H. pp. 19, 188, 542.) The enforcement of this law will entail a large expense upon the State but still it will be carried out. Then there was passed by the House what is known as the Newell Garnishee law. H. F. No. 37. "An act to abolish the process of garnishments as applied to workingmen." (J. of H. pp. 28, 62, 279, 657.)

Then there was also passed S. F. No. 40. "An act establishing a bureau of labor statistics and appropriating money for the maintenance thereof" (J. of H. pp. 378, 492, 773, 614.)This law is in practical operation to-day and two prominent Knights of Labor are at the head of the Labor Bureau.

To make a long story short it can be truthfully asserted that the laboring men got everything they asked for and in all the measures proposed in their interest they were assisted, and their efforts supported by Speaker Merriam.

If there is any class of men that have good reasons to gratefully remember the last session of the legislature it is the laboring men, and this they can do by giving "honor to whom honor is due." It is generally conceded that both branches of the legislature the House stands nearest to the people, and who can deny that it would have been impossible to pass many of the laws above referred to if a friend of monopoly had occupied the Speaker's chair and by the appointment of his committees shaped legislation. The passage of such meritorious legislation is the very best evidence and the strongest proof that the deliberations of the House were presided over by a man of the people and a friend of the oppressed.

In the appointment of his committees Mr. Merriam paid less attention to party ties than to ability and honesty. Thus he appointed Mr. Donnelly at the head of the railroad committee, Mr. Furlong, another Alliance man, at the head of the committee to investigate the cost of construction of railroads; and Mr. Colby chairman of the joint committee on labor, the latter committee being an entire new feature in legislative committees. Of all the important committees with the exception of the committee on judiciary, Mr. Merriam gave the chairmanship to the country districts, and not the chairmanship alone but also a good working majority of the members of the committees.

"The "State Farmers' Alliance" at its annual meeting in February, 1887, recognizing the services of Lieut. Governor Rice and Speaker Merriam, adopted the following resolution:

SECTION II.

Resolved: That the State Alliance thank the state legislature for the noble work it is doing in behalf of the people, in both branches; and that we desire to express our approval of the course of Lieutenant Governor Rice, president of the senate, and of Hon. W. R. Merriam, speaker of the house, for their fair and just manner in which they appointed the committees of the senate and house.

And on the last day of the session the following resolution was offered by Mr. Donnelly and unanimously adopted by a rising vote.

Resolved: That this House desires in this formal manner to express its high sense of the fairness, impartiality, ability and parliamentary skill displayed by the Hon. William R. Merriam Speaker of the House, in the discharge of the duties of his responsible and difficult office. We believe that he has tried to hold the scale of justice even-handed, and that he has proved faithful to all the great interests of the state, in the administration of the trust reposed in it. The House desires to express in this way its hearty and unanimous desire for his future prosperity and happiness. (J. of H. p. 899.)

And thus came to a close the legislative record of a presiding officer of the House of representatives who in all future times will be remembered as the farmers' and the laboring man's friend; whose record will stand the closest scrutiny of all people in favor of good legislation; who stands pre-eminently as a personal illustration of honesty, integrity and fidelity to the various interests of our great state, the champion of peoples rights and the enemy of monopoly and oppression. He was weighed in the balance and not found wanting.

This man has been nominated by the Republicans of this State for governor, and here we may ask: who was it that nominated him? Was it the delegations from the cities? Was it those engaged in monopolies and connected with the large corporations? No. Mr. Merriam was placed in nomination by those whom he had befriended and supported while Speaker of the House, by the rural districts of the state. It is the first time in the political history of the state that a man has been placed in nomination for the high office of governor whose nomination was not manipulated and brought about by the delegations from the large cities.

While Mr. Merriam is a city man his nomination is distinctly a country nomination and as such a fitting reward of merit. He will if elected be under no obligation to these cities; he is in no shape or manner allied or connected with the railroad and grain monopolists; and will be in the truest sense of the word a people's governor.

True, Mr. Merriam is a banker; but what has a man's vocation to do if he embodies in himself official honesty and unselfishness, as Mr. Merriam has proven that he does? Fearlessness, honesty, executive ability, unselfishness, and the confidence of the agricultural and labor voters, who have placed him in nomination for the highest office in the gift of the people of this State, are his record, and upon that record, he goes before the people soliciting their suffrages.

The Tiger and his Prey.

From the London Times.

In a paper read before the Bombay Natural History Society recently, and published in its journal, Mr. Inverarity, a noted shikari, discussed the habits of the tiger, and especially the mode in which it kills and eats its prey. Some think he seizes by the throat, others by the nape of the neck from above. Mr Inverarity has examined scores of slain animals with special reference to this point, and in every case but one the throat was seized from below. The exception was an old boar who had been seized by the neck from above. One of the single file of villagers who was once seized by the nape of the neck by a man-eater, but saved by his companions, had no idea when he recovered his senses what had happened. Whether dislocation of the neck takes place is doubtful. The tame hunting leopards always kill by pressure on the wind-pipe, without breaking the skin; possibly the tiger kills in the same way. It is only by accident, if at all, that tigers in killing sever any important vein or artery, and no blood to speak of flows from the throat wounds.

Very large and powerful animals like the bull, buffalo, and bison, if attacked at all, are in the first instance attacked from the rear with a view to disable them. Having killed, the tiger almost invariable begins eating a hind quarter, consuming one or probably both. Sometimes he leaves the stomach and intestines as they are; sometimes he will remove them to one side, making a neat parcel of them. A tiger and tigeress together will finsih an ordinary-sized animal at one meal, leaving only the head. In this case it is probable that the second begins at the fore quarter. Animals are never eaten where they are killed but are always dragged a short distance. They are not lifted clear of the ground, but dragged. Having gorged himself, the tiger sometimes lies close by his prey, but if it is hot weather and there are hills in the neighborhood he will go a long distance off before resting for the day. He prefers to lie in a cool cave or in a breeze on the hillside than in the close, hot jungle. He returns next night and finishes what is left, but he never eats a second time on the same spot, dragging the remains of the prey 40 or 50 yards off. Sportsmen coming on a half-devoured animal and desiring to catch the tiger, tie the prey to a tree. The tiger takes about two hours, steady eating to finish the fore quarters of a bullock. Mr. Inverarity sat over a small tigress one night who ate for 10 minutes, then went away for 20, probably to drink, and on her return ate steadily for two and a quarter hours. He did not fire, as he could not see her.

Tigers are cannibals; they will make their meals off each other. They are supposed to kill once in five or six days, and no doubt the tiger after a heavy feed does not care to hunt much for a few days; but a tiger kills whenever he can. They have been known to kill on fourteen consecutive nights

Candidates for a Harem.

From the London Figaro.

The harem of the youthful Emperor of China is growing, and he will soon be as much married as any Eastern potentate could desire. According to a Shanghai native paper, no less than 136 Pekin carts were to be seen outside a gate of the Nanhai Palace at Pekin on the morning of the 9th July, each containing a candidate for the Emperor's harem from mandarin families of the Manchu, Mongol, and Chinese banner population. The Empress held a fresh inspection on that day, and selected for the youthful Emperor of fei-pin half a dozen and of the lower rank of hung-nu a score of damsels. One hundred and ten of the fair ones (if yellow-skinned and black-haired demoiselles can so be termed) had to return disappointed to their homes.

Building Law in Berlin.

According to Building, the new law in Berlin is very strict: No building can occupy more than two-thirds of the ground, nor be higher than the width of the street. None can be occupied as a dwelling until six months after it is built, and the number of persons to be permitted in each sleeping-room is to be prescribed by the sanitary inspectors by the rule of so many cubic feet of space for each person. No unventilated or unlighted room is allowed to be used for personal occupation. Severe penalties are exacted for violation or neglect of the rules.

Big Guns Come High.

The average price is said to be $1,000 a ton which would make 57-ton gun cost $57,000. The giant guns, like human giants, are early affected with consumptive tendencies. Some officers estimate the vitality of a giant gun at 200 discharges, while others say that it is setting it to high. Assuming that a 57-ton gun is practically used up after 200 discharges, the cost of depreciation per discharges is therefore $285 in addtion to expensive projectiles and cartridges.—Boston Transcript.

Valiant Gander.

A combat between a cow and a gander is described by a newspaper of Albany, Ga. The cow made a violent attack on the gander, when, with much deliberation and coldness, the bird, as the cow rushed on him, caught a strong hold with his beak on the hair and hide between the horns and flapped his wings furiously.

The astonished cow was glad to shake her antagonist off. But after retreating a few feet and looking at the proud neck and insignificant form of the hauty bird, again dashed at the gander.

The gander was, if possible, a little more deliberate this time in taking his hold, and, with swift and strong wings showered his blows on the head and eyes of his foe.

The cow had evidently miscalculated the prowess of her diminutive enemy, and after considerable effort shook the pugnacious bird off and beat a retreat, with many a shake of her head.

A bad man has been making it unpleasant for many Maine folks. His name is Donald Morrison, he has been a cowboy in the far West, and he is wanted in Maine for murder and arson. He is now roaming the woods in the Lake Megantic region, in Canada. The Canadian police have tried to capture him and failed. An ex-deputy Sheriff from the American side tried it and was shot dead. One man in the region offered $800 reward for him, and since that time his private launch on the lake and a planing mill have been burned, and he expects that his house will follow. When the Megantic Fishing Club passed through the village of Agnes the other day Morrison entered the American House barroom, which was thronged, ordered drinks for the crowd, told who he was, and, tossing down a big drink of whisky, swore that he would never be taken alive. The authorities have apparently abandoned all attempts to bring him to justice.

The Sioux Indians who have gone to Washington to see Secretary Vilas in regard to the proposed sale of a part of their reservation have been holding pow-wows every day, endeavoring to agree upon a programme to be followed at the conference. From all that can be learned, it seems improbable that any agreement will be reached as a result of the Indians' visit to Washington. It is said that they are almost hopelessly split up among themselves, and that there is still no prospect of their being able to unite on any proposition.

The general land office at Washington held for cancellation 24,320 acres of the selections in the Ashland, Wis., land district made by the Wisconsin Central railroad company on the ground that the line of the road under the grant of 1856 for the St. Croix & Lake Superior railroad company (now the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railroad company) having been definitely located and withdrawal made for indemnity purpose prior to the passage of the act making the grant to the Wisconsin Central, the lands within the six and fifteen miles limit of the first named road were for all purposes reserved from the grant to the second.

Another accident occurred on the Lehigh Valley road near Wilkesbarre, Pa. It was caused by a failure on the part of those in charge of the construction train to flag the approaching train. The freight train was running on telegraph orders to make a siding and allow the passenger train to pass. In this case the rules require conductors of construction trains to guard both ends of their train. Besides twenty-six Hungarians injured the list includes F. Hawk, conductor; F. N. Peck, engineer, and Charles Fry, fireman of the freight train. It is believed that Peck and Fry will die.

W. L. Morrison, a former county official of Barron, Wis., has been placed in the jail after leading the sheriff an eventful chase. Morrison about four years ago suddenly disappeared after a sharp business transaction. He was subsequently arrested, but settled the affair and lived with his family apparently a good citizen. About a year ago he eloped with a married woman, leaving his family destitute. Last spring he was discovered to be in Missouri. The sheriff of Barron left at once and secured Morrison. On the return trip Morrison leaped from the rapidly moving train and escaped. All efforts to find him failed, until a few days ago he was arrested in Wisconsin, and will be tried for adultery.

Pauline McCoy, a negro girl aged nineteen, was hanged at Union Springs, Ala., for the murder of Annie Jordan, a fourteen-year-old white child, last February. The execution was private, only the necessary persons being admitted. The crime for which the woman was hanged was a peculiar one. The victim, Annie Jordan, strayed away from her home in Montgomery and was not heard from till her dead body was found in a plumb thicket at Three Notch. Circumstances pointed to Pauline, and she was arrested with the dead girl's clothing on her. She was found guilty last spring and sentenced to death. Efforts were made to have the governor intercede, but to no avail.

A fatal saloon row occurred at the close of the monthly fair at Cokato, Minn. James Erickson, a saloon keeper of Annandale, was in one of the saloons, and had some words with those present. About this time John Anderson, a well-known farmer of French Lake township, entered the same saloon in an inebriated condition, and entered into a dispute with the bartender as to the price of some drinks. Erickson chimed in and made some insulting remarks to Anderson. Upon the latter's telling him not to address him in such a tone of voice, Erickson struck Anderson two powerful blows, one in the neck and the other in the stomach, killing him almost instantly. Erickson was at once arrested, and is now in Buffalo in the custody of Sheriff Nugent.

Thomas Wardell a very wealthy land owner and coal operator, was shot and instantly killed by a number of striking miners. Mr. Wardell had driven from Macon in his carriage, accompanied only by a colored boy. He stopped his horses at Berier, Mo., and crossed the railroad track, going into the telegraphic office to send a message. The depot platform was filled with striking miners, and as he passed through the crowd, going to his carriage, they jeered and taunted him. Turning, he said: "Boys, I'll beat you in the end; you can holler all you want." The men commenced throwing stones at him, and he was struck in the back by one. Upon reaching his carriage Mr. Wardell took from under the seat a large revolver and fired one shot in the direction of the crowd, but above their heads. In an instant a half dozen shots or more came from the crowd, and Wardell dropped lifeless.

An extensive mail robbery was perpetrated at Buffalo, New York. The robbery was general in character and covered letters from East, West, North and South. There were found checks, drafts, mercantile orders and the usual miscellany. There was a check found in which its amount, 319.90, alone remained intact. Bank drafts, a letter notifying the inclosure of a draft for $1,404.24, the draft being missing, and numerous letters notifying of the inclosure of cash, were also found. They were torn so the signatures were indistinguishable. The thieves had evidently disregarded everything but cash. Soon after the banks opened a man named John Shields, a night stamping clerk at one of the banks, and upon the request to identify himself, establishing his connection with the postoffice. He was promptly handed over to the police. Shields did not attempt to deny the charge of robbing the mail, and is now in custody.

From Foreign Lands.

Only a summary of Dr. Mackenzie's book is yet accessible to the public in Berlin, but enough is known of its contents to arouse savage indignation in official circles. Putting aside the medical dispute, the charges which Dr. Mackenzie levels at Prince Bismarck, of inciting the German doctors to entrap him into a doubtful declaration as to the nature of the Emperor's disease, are felt to be a poisonous slander upon the reputation of the chancellor.

A dispatch to the London Chronicle from Rome says: "The interview between the pope and Emperor William was a cordial one. The emperor assured the pope that he would adhere to a conservative policy in politics and social and religious affairs. The pope replied that in security and grandeur Germany would gain much if the liberty of the Catholic church and the independence of the papacy in Germany were more effectually guaranteed. He said also that it was necessary in the interests of European civilization that the Roman question should be settled satisfactorily. The pope was pleased with Emperor William's remarks.

The China mail, per the steamer City of Pekin from Hong Cong and Yokohama, reports a disastrous flood near Fang-shan-hsien, in the vicinity of Pekin. The night of Aug. 13 seven and a half inches of rain fell in Pekin, and immense volumes of water collected in the ravines about Lien-li-ho and suddenly broke in upon twenty villages. More than 10,000 people were drowned and a large number of draught animals. Villages in the valleys near Pekin are in danger every season, as the hills are destitute of grass, and the waters flow together in fearful torrents, unimpeded by the vegetation. News of the catastrophe was brought by the missionaries who had been living near the scene of the disaster.

A cable dispatch says: The Pacific mail contract has been signed between the imperial government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Tenders for three steamers will be received within a week. The stipulated service is to commence in 18 months, the company receiving annually £45,000 from the imperial government, in addition to £15,000 from the Dominion government, for monthly service for 10 years from Vancouver, not only to Yokohama and Hong Kong, as first intended, but also calling at Shanghai. Increasing anxiety is felt to learn that the Dominion government realizes that the whole efficiency of the Canadian route to the East now depends on the Atlantic service. If that equals that by New York, say 18 knots, the Canadian route to Hong Kong can easily compete with the Suez.

News Generalities.

Lewis Chandler the young teacher of Jackson county Wis., who was arrested some time ago, accused of sending obscene language through the mails, went to Madison for trial. The attorney general had been petitioned to dismiss the case, but refused to do it. The young man pleaded guilty to the charge, and was sent to the reform school for one year.

The Manitoba house at Fargo was entered by a masked thief, who stole from the proprietor $150 in money, a valuable gold watch and chain and a revolver, and from two of the boarders a small sum of money. The two boarders occupied the same room, and the burglar after compelling them at the point of a pistol to be quiet, took their cash locked them in their room and departed, taking the key with him.

It is feared that the peace which was patched up last night between the Chicago street car company and its employes will prove to be only temporary. According to agreement the West side men returned to work on Saturday and the cars ran as usual all day. On the North side the imported men, under police protection, ran a few cars over all the lines, and although there were rumors of riots and disturbances at various times during the day they all proved to be unfounded and the new men were not molested.

Christina Louise Larsen, the 15-year-old daughter of Peter Larsen, who lives in Clark's Hill, east of Joliet, Ill., disappeared from her home recently and has not since been seen. Her father says that she was sent after the cows in a pasture near the new machine shops of the Belt line road. There is quite a stretch of woods near there, through which runs a stream of water. Twenty-five men spent all day searching for the girl. There is great excitement over her disappearance, and fears of foul play or abduction are entertained. Mr. Larsen says his daughter has no lover, nor had she ever expressed a desire to leave her home. A gang of hoodlums are known to have infested the woods near Larsen's home, and the father fears they may be responsible for the girl's disappearance.

The coal and wheat traffic of West Superior Wis., this year is larger than that of any other city of the size in the world. Over 700,000 tons of coal will be the footings up at the docks of the Lehigh, the Northwestern, the St. Paul & Pacific and the Ohio companies. Duluth docks will receive about 800,000 tons. Up to date the elevators here have shipped 5,573,416 bushels of grain, and the Duluth elevators 6,627,584 bushels. The saw mills of Peyton, Kimball & Barbour and Jones & Murray have turned out 21,000,000 feet of lumber, 10,000,000 shingles and 6,000,000 lath. Over one-fifth of the entire tonnage passing through the Soo canal this season is freight coming to or going from West Superior. The Lehigh company fired up fourteen of its fifty coke ovens, and is making the first coke manufactured on Lake Superior.

McGarigle Not a Boodler.

McGarigle, the Chicago official who now lives in Northeast British America, was at Winnipeg the other day, and in an interview said: If anybody can show that I got one dollar of county money, city money or anybody's else money that I did not honestly and legitimately earn in a business way, I will not only not object to being called a "boodler," but will allow anybody to take me back to Chicago. I have lost instead of having gained anything from connection with politics, therefore I naturally feel sore at being styled by the press, here and elsewhere, a "boodler." With this exception I have nothing to find fault with in the treatment I have received here. In view of what has transpired I sometimes think it was a mistake that I did not "boodle," seeing that I have just as much notoriety as if I had; but as it is, I defy the whole world to show that I ever in my life got a single dollar dishonestly from anybody. The only mistake I ever made was interfering too much in politics; but, while there was nothing dishonest in my connection therewith, some of the men with whom I had dealings were dishonest, but it was a matter over which I had no more control than you had. I am not guilty even of the charge of general conspiracy. I have as many friends as ever, and have received many kind letters from old friends in Chicago and neighborhood, who would be only too glad to see me back there, even as I should be to get back. I will go back when matters are straightened out as I want them, probably this winter. I have done nothing for which I should be troubled. I am straighter than those who made trouble for me. I fought the thing as long as I could, and when it was impossible to fight it any longer I left. When the excitement has cooled off and other cases disposed of, then I will ask them to consider my matter, but not before. It will be only a question of time.

McGarigle asked that the Canadian press should not call him boodler. During the whole of his political life, extending upwards of 18 years, he had lost money, whatever place he held, and he complained bitterly that his numerous so-called politician friends had deserted him in the lurch. The friends which he had were not politicians, but men of financial and business standing.

Important Railroad Decision.

A very important decision was filed at St. Paul in the United States circuit court by Judge Brewer relating to the second indemnity belt of the Northern Pacific Railroad company. The case is Northern Pacific Railroad Company vs. The United States, Peter Johanson, Andrew Johanson et al. and was argued in St. Paul on the last day of the June term by James McNaught for the company and C. D. Kerr for defendants. The charter of the Northern Pacific passed by congress in 1864 granted the company twenty alternate sections per mile on each side of the road in the territories, and ten alternate sections per mile on each side of the road in the states. For any lands otherwise occupied before the line was definitely located the railroad company was allowed to select, in lieu thereof, "odd-numbered sections not more than ten miles beyond the limit of said alternate sections." This ten miles beyond the main grant is known as the indemnity belt. In a joint resolution of 1870 congress authorized the company to mortgage its lands and provided as follows:

In the event of there not being in any state or territory in which said main line or branch may be located, at the time of the final location thereof, the amount of lands per mile granted by congress to said company within the limits prescribed by its charter, then said company shall be entitled, under the directions of the secretary of the interior, to receive so many sections of land belonging to the United States, and designated by odd numbers, in such state or territory, within ten miles on each side of the said road beyond the limits prescribed in said charter as will make up such deficiency, etc.

It was the question of a second indemnity belt which was at issue in this case. In 1887 Secretary Lamar held that the joint resolution of 1870 did not create a second indemnity belt, although it had been recognized by his predecessors for sixteen years. The defendants in this case other than the United States are settlers on lands selected by the Northern Pacific in the second indemnity belt. When these settlers began to cut timber a temporary injunction was obtained by the company. The defendants demurred to the complaint, and denied the right of the railroad company to a second indemnity belt, this being the sole defense. At the outset of his decision, which is in favor of the railroad company, Judge Brewer says:

The single question in this case is whether the joint resolution of congress of May 31, 1870, gave to the plaintiff an additional ten-mile indemnity limit. In an opinion filed Aug. 15, 1887, Mr. Secretary Lamar, then secretary of the interior, held that it did not. The reorganized ability of the distinguished secretary, now one of the justices of the supreme court, compels a careful consideration of his views and reasons.

Judge Brewer then reviews at considerable length the charter of the company and the joint resolution, citing the pertinent parts of them. Secretary Lamar's decision is then cited and thoroughly discussed, and the judge gives at length his reasons for differing with Mr. Lamar. He cites the contemporary construction of the interior department and attorneys general of the United States in official opinions. He cites extracts from speeches made on the resolution by congressmen showing that they understood a second indemnity was granted; and holds that there being no express provision for the repeal of the prior grant, it was not repealed, as the two was not consistent.

Public Lands in Minnesota.

The annual report of the commissioner of the general land office is printed. Of surveys in Minnesota he says:

Three contracts and one set of special instructions were awarded and approved for small fragmentary subdivisional surveys during the year; total liability, $325. In addition to the said fragments a contract was awarded and approved in June, 1887, for surveys within the White Earth reservation. This contract was authorized by the department on the recommendation of the commissioner of Indian affairs. The demand for public survey by actual settlers on land within his district is clearly stated by the United States surveyor general in his annual report. The demand for public surveys by actual settlers had greatly increased during the past year. A large number of settlers are reported to have located upon the unsurveyed lands lying northwest of the Red Lake Indian reservation, and a petition signed by thirty of said settlers representing improvements valued at $18,000, has been received by me asking for the survey of said lands. A large number of the residents of the countries in which these lands are located have also petitioned for the survey of the same. A large proportion of these lands are reported to be suitable for agricultural purposes, and if they were surveyed would soon be settled upon and improved. In the northwestern portion of the state, in the vicinity of Vermillion lake, in consequence of the rapid developement of the iron interests and the large growth of such towns as Tower and Fly, there is an increasing demand for lands for settlement, and applications from persons claiming to be bona fide settlers have been received during the year past asking for the survey of about twenty townships. Some of these settlers state that they have been living on their claims for more then four years. In some of these towns it is stated that there are over forty settlers. I consider it very desirable that these surveys should be made as early as practical, and would request that I may be authorized to survey during the fiscal years such townships as are occupied by any considerable number of settlers.

Small space is devoted to the surveys in Dakota. The commissioner says:

The sum of $11,000 was apportioned to Dakota for surveys during the fiscal year, under which six contracts for public land surveys were awarded and approved. In addition thereto two contracts for Indian reservation surveys (one of the allotments within the Devil's Lake reservation, and one for the western boundary of the Sioux reservation). Total liabilities of $9,350 were awarded and approved.

Remarkable Suicide.

C. S. Redfield, for a number of years connected with McVicker's theater, Chicago, holding an excursion ticket from Portland to St. Paul, was put off at the Atlantic express at Bogeman, Montana, on Thursday morning Oct. 18, under the influence of some powerful drug and was immediately taken charge of by the officers. A physician was summoned and everything possible done to arouse him. About 8 o'clock they brought him around, and for two hours he was quite rational but seemed to be in great distress about something which he wished to communicate, but on gaining his senses he found himself surrounded by total strangers, and naturally, had the lack of confidence to do so. About 1 o'clock the physician in charge advised them that he should go to bed. He undressed himself without assistance and retired. In a few moments he relapsed into a stupor again from which he never recovered. He died at the Laclede hotel at 5:45. A Chicago man, who got on the train at Garrison, knew him and suspected that he had taken poison and had him aroused. While partly conscious he said that he was a ruined man; that he had intended to commit suicide; that he had worked at McVicker's theater for twenty-two years; and saved money, had taken a large amount West, and asked for a man named Gannan and for his diamonds. Among his possessions were a draft on Chicago for $2,000, $65 in money, diamond sleeve buttons and pin and a $3 silver watch, without a chain. The inference is that he was drugged and robbed in Portland, and afterward took morphine with suicidal intent. The passengers on the train saw him take morphine and when they took it away he said if what he had taken did not kill him he would take more when he could get it.

Indicted for Murder.

The grand jury of Wright county, Iowa, returned an indictment against Mrs. P. Bertha Diggle, of the Ford Dramatic company, for the murder of her husband, George Diggle, on the 24th of May. Mrs. Diggle had left her husband and six months' old babe at their home in Sioux Falls to join the Ford company as leading lady. In the latter part of May, while the company was playing an engagement at Clarion Mr. Diggle made his appearance, and endeavored to persuade his wife to return home and quit the stage forever. She refused at first but finally consented and secured her release, after which she again changed her mind and refused to go home. She and her husband had been out walking, and returned to her boarding house about 5 p. m. She then said she had forgotten something and excused herself and went to a drug store where she purchased 24 grains of morphine. [illegible] Sioux Falls. Shortly afterwards he was seized with violent pains, which she said [illegible] which her husband suffered from and declined to send for a doctor. Finally the landlady despatched a messenger for a doctor, who upon examining the patient, said he was poisoned; that there was no evidence of heart trouble. Then Mrs. Diggle said, "My God, he has taken my morphine." Later, the paper which had contained the drug was found in an outhouse, where Mrs. Diggle had been seen shortly after the doctor's arrival. The patient died before anything could be done for him, never having been out of the house after drinking the beer. On this evidence the grand jury held the wife for murder.

American and Canadian Fraternity.

The Knights of Pythias excursion from Winnipeg to Pembina was a grand success. Over 600 people came on the train. Accompanying the Knights and their friends from Winnipeg were Premier Greenway, Hon. Mayor Jones, Hon. Mr. Sifton, Chief McRobie and about twenty other big guns of Manitoba politics. After lunch given to about seventy-five of the most distinguished of the party at the residence of ex-Mayor Charles Cavileer, speeches of welcome was made by the Rev. C. H. Treglawn and others, which were responded to by Premier Greenway, Mayor Jones, the Hon. Mr. Sifton and Chief McRobie. The premier was received with great applause. He thanked the people for their kind utterances, and expressed his pleasure at having with his colleagues the honor of having carried out the scheme of the work of the Red River Valley railway, and thereby uniting Pembina and Winnipeg. He welcomed the Northern Pacific because it would become a great factor in building up Manitoba. He observed (confidentially to the Yankees) that before him was an array of reporters from Winnipeg so that he would have to be careful not to say anything but what he firmly believed. He thought it was a good thing to be united across our imaginary line. People said it was not a good thing to allow. Canadians to mix up with American people, and it had looked like it when there was so much talk of retaliation; but after the bloodless battles of politicians on either side of the line had been fought, we would not hear so much of talk of keeping ourselves apart. As a political warfare between the two great parties of this side was going on, he deemed it unwise to make a political speech, but he would say that the United States was a grand example, both of protection and free trade—protection on the outside and free trade among the various states. He hoped to see some of the barriers that now existed removed, and he hoped that the day would come when intercourse in business would be freer and when the relations between the two countries would be closer than they were at the present time. The people of Manitoba were about identified with the people of Dakota, raising the same crops and sending them to the same markets. After the speech-making was over the entire assemblage sang "God Save the Queen," and the bands struck up a "Yankee Doodle."

Yellow Fever Situation.

The Jacksonville board of health adopted a resolution requesting the United States officials to aid by regulation and organization in preventing the return of absent citizens until frost occurs. The pith of a long address is in the following words:

Neither the houses or atmosphere of Jacksonville are less dangerous to the unacclimated than they were a month since, and we would earnestly warn all who are liable to contract yellow fever against venturing to come here, merely because they may see that there are no new cases reported. Wait until the board of health notifies you that the epidemic is not only over, but that is reasonably safe for absentees and strangers to come here again, and then return, only under such restrictions and directions as may be advised by the authorities. We would add that there does not appear to be any probable grounds upon which to base an expectation that this time, so earnestly desired by us all, will come earlier than the very last of November or the beginning of December.

There are twenty-seven new cases of yellow fever for the past twenty-four hours. Assistant Surgeon Martin reports from Gainesville, Fla., that there have been sixteen cases and six deaths from yellow fever in that city, but that no cases have occurred since Oct. 15. Dr. Fox at St. Augustine reports to the marine hospital bureau that he has made a thorough inspection of St. Augustine, and that he found no indication of yellow fever.

The Whitechapel Horrors.

London Cablegram: The mass of absurd theories, false clues and unlimited arrests of the wrong men which have almost turned the pursuit of the Whitechapel murderer into a burlesque, were releived at last by a genuine sensation. Mr. George Lusk, a builder, is the head of the Whitechapel vigilance committee. Late on Tuesday night, the 16th inst., the parcel post left a box at his house. Upon opening it he discovered a meaty substance which smelt very strong and which he judged to be the half of a kidney belonging to some animal. Inclosed in the box was the following letter:

I send you half of the kidney I took from one of the women. I preserved it for you. The other piece I fried and ate. It was very nice. I may send you the bloody knife that took it out if you only wait a while longer.

Mr. Lusk at first regarded the whole thing as a joke. But remembering that such an organ had been taken from the Mitre square victim, he took the box to the London hospital. Dr. Openshaw examined the inclosure and said that it certainly came from a full-grown woman and had been divided longitudinally. Subsequently the box and letter were taken to Scot and yard and the detectives are trying to find out in what postal district the parcel was handed in for mail. The handwriting of the letter in the box bears no resemblance to the handwriting of the letters of "Jack the Ripper" found some weeks ago.

Postoffice Reports

Col. J. F. Bates, the chief of the free delivery service, in his annual report to the postmaster general states that the increase in the number of free delivery offices during the past year was 169, making the total number of offices 358. The whole number of carriers employed is 6,346. There were over ninety million more letters delivered last year than the year before, an increase of over 11 per cent, while the increase in the number of newspapers delivered was over eighty-six millions, or 25 per cent. The increase in the number of letters collected was 143,000,000, or about 23 per cent, while the increase in the number of newspapers collected was 25,000,000, or 25 per cent. The excess of postage on local matter over total cost of service is over two million and a quarter dollars. At three of the principal cities of the Northwest the total pieces of mail matter of all kinds handled and the number of carriers employed in each city is as follows:

	Number of Carriers.	Pieces of Mail.
Milwaukee, Wis.	58	26,412,377
Minneapolis, Minn.	53	21,809,902
St. Paul, Minn.	58	31,639,176

Judge Thurman's Letter at Last.

The following is judge Thurman's letter of acceptance which was given to the public on October 13th. Columbus, Ohio, Oct. 12 1888—Hon. Patrick A. Collins and Others Committee—Gentleman: In obedience to custom, I send you this formal acceptance of my nomination for the office of vice president of the United States, made by the national convention of the Democratic party at St. Louis. When you did me the honor to call upon me at Columbus and officially notify me of my nomination, I expressed to you my sense of obligation to the convention and stated that although I had not sought the nomination, I did not feel at liberty, under the circumstances, to decline it. I thought then, as I still think, that whatever I could properly do to promote the re-election of President Cleveland I ought to do. His administration has been marked by such integrity, good sense, manly courage and exalted patriotism that a just appreciation of these high qualities seems to call for his re-election. I am also so strongly impressed with the belief that his re-election would powerfully tend to strengthen that feeling of fraternity among the American people that is essential to their welfare, peace and happiness, and to the perpetuity of the Union and of our free institutions. I approve the platform of the St. Louis convention, and I cannot too strongly express my dissent from the heretical teachings of the monopolists that the welfare of a people can be promoted by a system of extortionate far in excess of the wants of the government. The idea that a people can be enriched by heavy and unnecessary taxation, that a man's condition can be improved by taxing him on all his wife and children wear, on all his tools and implements of industry is an obvious absurdity. To fill the vaults of the treasury with an idle surplus, for which the government has no legitimate use, and to create a powerful and dangerous stimulus to extravagance and corruption in the expenditures of the government seems to me to be a policy at variance with every sound principle of government and of political economy. The necessity or reducing taxation to prevent such an accumulation of surplus revenue and the consequent depletion of the circulating medium, is so apparent that no party dares to deny it; but when we come to consider the modes by which the reduction may be made we find between our party and the monopolistic leaders of our political opponents. We seek to reduce taxes upon the necessaries of life; our opponents seek to increase them. We say, give to the masses of the people cheap and good clothing, cheap blankets, cheap tools and cheap lumber. The Republicans by their platform and their leaders in the senate, by their proposed bill, say, increase the taxes on clothing and blankets, and thereby increase their cost, maintain a high duty on the tools of the farmer and mechanic and upon the lumber which they need for the construction of their modest dwellings, shops and barns, and thereby prevent their obtaining these necessaries at reasonable prices. Can any sensible man doubt as to where he should stand in this controversy? Can any well informed man be deceived by the false pretense that a system so unreasonable and unjust is for the benefit of laboring men? Much is said about competition of American laborers with the pauper labor of Europe; but does not every man who looks around him see that [illegible] an immense majority of the laborers in America are not engaged in what are called the protected industries? And is it not undeniable that the duties proposed by the Democratic measure called the Mills bill far exceed the difference between American and European wages, and that, if it were admitted that our workingmen can be protected by tariffs against cheaper labor, they would be fully protected, and more than protected by that bill? Does not every well informed man know that the increase in price of home manufactures produced by a high tariff does not go into the pockets of labor, but only tend to swell the profits of capital? [illegible] the policy of the Democratic party is plainly presented [illegible] the people [illegible] and at the same time increase the share of the laboring man in the benefits of national prosperity and growth. I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALLEN G. THURMAN.

EN ROUTE FOR INDIANA.

Street Murder in New York.

Two well-dressed men of dark complexion were observed standing in front of Cooper Institute in New York. They were talking in animated Italian and gesticulated freely. William Garrity, who was standing near saw the men were drunk and did not give particular attention to them. [illegible] Garrity did not suspect that the man was hurt until he steadied himself against the large pole and sat or rather collapsed and sat on the curbstone directly in front of the pole against which he leaned with his face upward. The other man walked away.

A policeman, who was on the northeast corner of Eighth street and Third avenue, saw a crowd collecting around the man. He opened the man's coat and vest and found the shirt bosom dyed with blood. The man was breathing faintly. Within a yard of his feet was a black handled baker's knife with a blade nine inches long. [illegible] He was dead before an ambulance could get there. The surgeon said that his heart had been pierced [illegible] The man wore a valuable diamond ring, and carried several ladies' diamond rings in his pocket, besides $172.42 in cash. He wore a gold watch and chain. The dead man was identified at the station house as Antonio Pinccionio, 45 years old. He lived at [illegible] Third avenue with the family of an Italian grocery man named Manasco, in whose shop he was a clerk.

A Baltimore Mystery.

The Baltimore police are wrestling with a conspiracy case which will require more than ordinary skill to unravel. The principals in the case are William A. Taffee, a young lawyer, Hamilton Delahy, a confidential clerk and Annie Herbert, the keeper of a disorderly house. About four weeks ago the woman received by mail a letter [illegible] would do a certain job for $50. This job was to smear a liquid on the face of a party to be named. She was to answer in the columns of a daily paper. This letter bore no signature, and was at once handed over to Marshal Frey. [illegible] the following:

"H. I—I agree."

The next day Annie Herbert received a bottle filled with sulphuric acid, and accompanying it was an other informing her that William A. Taffee, a lawyer on Lexington avenue, was the man on whom it was to be used. [illegible] she proposed to do and to let him know through the paper. To this the detective returned [illegible] "H D" would be at the [illegible] him at the American office. George McLaughlin, a small boy, called for the letter and was arrested. He said he had been sent by Ham Delahy. [illegible] arrested Delahy. His explanation is that the [illegible] letter was for him. Taffee does not know Delahy, and the woman knows neither.

The swine plague has been infesting the vicinity of Mason City, Iowa, for the past year. The chief of the bureau of animal industry of the United States has been asked to investigate it. A hog which had been dead but a few hours was examined by a local physician, and found to be terribly enlarged, [illegible] pus.

Jesse Mason, a farmer eighty years-old, residing near Stilesville, Hendricks county, Indiana, sold some of the products of his farm, for which he received $60. Logan York, a young man of evil reputation, witnessed the transfer of money, and in the evening, in company with an unknown man, knocked at Mason's door. [illegible] Orman Mason, appeared on the scene with a loaded shot gun, which he discharged, almost blowing York's head off, and killing him instantly. The other man escaped in the dark.

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

Monday, Oct. 15.

SENATE—The feature of the Senate's proceedings today was the speech of Mr. Blair on the President's pension vetoes. Mr. Blair, in connection with the President's veto of the pension of Mrs. Sarah Woodbridge, went into the vetoes in general and the case of Mary Ann Dougherty in particular. He thought the matter of doing justice to this poor woman was just as serious as the passage of a tariff bill or the election of a President.

HOUSE.—Mr. Dougherty, of Florida, withdrew his point on no quorum upon consideration of the vote by which the House passed the Presidential count bill, and the motion to reconsider was carried, thus settling the passage of the bill, which now goes to the President.

Mr. Oates, of Alabama, offered a resolution adjourning congress sine die on Wednesday, Oct. 17. The resolution went over until tomorrow.

Mr. Wheeler of Alabama introduced a bill providing for the assemble of the Fifty-first and subsequent congresses on the 4th of March, at 1 o'clock, when an adjournment shall immediatly be taken until the first Monday in the December following, unless the president expresses a wish to the contrary.

Tuesday, Oct. 16.

SENATE.—The Senate devoted the entire day to the tariff question. Mr. Cockrell first took the floor in opposition to the Senate substitute.

HOUSE.—The only feature of the House proceedings today was the failure to agree upon date for final adjournment of congress. The House concurred in a Senate amendment to the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river at La Crosse, Wis.

Mr. Oates, of Alabama, called up his resolution for final adjournment, and after discussion it was further postponed until tomorrow. Mr. Oates said that he had failed in his effort to get the House to adjourn, and he would like to adjourn himself. He asked leave of absence for the remainder of the session, which was granted.

Wednesday, Oct. 17.

SENATE.—It is now practically decided that congress will adjourn on Saturday next. This arrangement has been made by an informal conference of Republican and Democratic senators. Senator Cockrell, at the close of his long speech yesterday in opposition to the new tariff bill, charged that the Republican senators dared not bring the session to a close. Promptly taking up the challenge, Mr. Allison appeared this morning with a resolution providing for a recess from Oct. 20 to Nov. 19. The Democrats opposed this plan, as they want an adjournment. The resolution was not acted upon to-day, but went over under an objection by Senator Morgan. It will be taken up to-morrow and amended so as to provide for an adjournment instead of a recess, and in that shape will be passed and sent to the House.

HOUSE.—The speaker laid before the House 13 messages from the President vetoing private pension bills. They were referred to the committee on invalid pensions.

Mr. Cox, of New York, rose to a question of privilege and read from the clerks desk an editorial in the New York Tribune [illegible] He declared the frank was a forgery.

Thursday, Oct. 18.

SENATE.—The long contest between the two houses of congress as to adjournment [illegible] The first session of the Fiftieth congress by the concurrent consent of the two houses is to come to an end on Saturday next, Oct. 20, at 1 o'clock p. m. There are only two possible contingencies which could be likely to interfere with adjournment. These are: The veto by the president of the deficiency appropriation bill, or the announcement by him that the [illegible] communicate to congress which he would not have ready by the time fixed for adjournment.

HOUSE.—The resolution of adjournment in the house was made the text of some parting campaign speeches, in one of which Mr. McMillan, representing the majority of the committee on ways and means, presented the comparison of the senate and the house tariff bill.

Friday, Oct. 19.

SENATE.—The committee on finance was authorized to continue its investigation of tariff matters during the recess, and may make some further inquiries as to trusts, [illegible] of the committees that have been authorized to do vacation work will undertake to do much. The committee on Indian affairs was authorized to continue during the recess at Washington the inquiry ordered by the senate as to the condition of the Indian tribes in Minnesota, Dakota and Montana.

HOUSE.—The House transacted no business today. Mr. Farquhar, of New York, objected to the approval of the journal, and raised the point which he insisted upon that the journal could not be read in the absence of a quorum. The speaker reversed the ruling of the speaker pro tem, and said that [illegible] it was the duty of the chair to order a call of the roll. He also held that the House had control of the approval of the journal.

Saturday, October 20.

SENATE.—Only seven senators had the benefit of the final prayer, this session, of the chaplain, Rev. J. G. Butler, namely, the presiding officer (Mr. Ingalls), and Messrs. Allison, Cockrell, Mitchell, Paddock, Saulsbury and Teller. Immediately after the reading of the journal the senate was informed by the presence of Messrs. Blackburn, Reagan and Sawyer. Mr. Allison, of the committee to wait on the president, reported that the committee had performed that duty and had been informed by the president that he had "no further communication to offer." The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE.—When the house met this morning at 11 o'clock, on the last day of the most protracted session in the annals of congress, in addition to the speaker, there were fifteen members in attendance. The closing hours of the session were comparable to those of none of its predecessors within the memory of the present generation. The hustle and excitement, the crowded corridors, the clamoring of claimants and lobbyists, the effort of legislators in behalf of belated measures, were conspicuously missing.

General Master Workman Powderly and General Secretary Hayes have prepared for the members of the order of the Knights of Labor a statement as to T. B. Barry's expulsion from the order. The formal resolution of expulsion appears to have been unanimously adopted by the general executive board on Oct. 15 and was based upon charges that he had illegally drawn money from the treasury of the order and had been guilty of other irregularities during his membership.

Thomas Brown, the man who murdered Policeman Paull of Moorehead Minn, has been known to be a professional crook, and is suspected to have been one of the burglars who robbed the Minnesota house and the Manitoba house a few nights ago. Policemen also think he is the man who shot at William Dent, and it is reported that he was sent to the penitentiary four years ago, but for what crime cannot be ascertained. During the day there has been strong talk of lynching Brown, and if he should be taken it would surprise no one. A crowd of several hundred went out to the jail, carrying with them a railroad tie to batter down the doors, but the sheriff had anticipated their visit and had spirited him away to some place of safety before their arrival.

Hon. J. A. Chapleau, secretary of state for Canada, was banqueted at Ottawa, by the workingmen's convention. He ridiculed the idea of annexation, and said that true Englishmen and French Canadians would never permit it to take place. Canada was destined to build up a great nationality. He denied trying to bully the Americans. [illegible] Sir John Macdonald said there is no danger of war between Canada and the United States. He felt hopeful of a satisfactory settlement of the fishery question. Canada is in a critical period, and must be prepared. If the new treaty cannot be negotiated Canada will revert to the treaty of 1818, whose interpretation she is willing to submit to.

If there is less shouting in this campaign than in some campaigns of former years, there is a great deal of harmony and dogged determination among republicans everywhere. That's what counts.

The democratic papers all over the country suppress the report of General Harrison's speeches. And yet they call themselves newspapers. They are afraid to let their readers read for themselves.

The republican papers print everything Cleveland chooses to say, but the democratic journals won't print what Harrison says, day after day, to the thousands who call upon him. They refuse to give him a hearing because he has demolished their side something less than a thousand times since he was nominated.

Dozens of our republican contemporaries remark that the enemy is on the run. Well, it does look so, but don't let's be too sure about this business. Let's follow General Grant's maxim—"lick 'em so they'll stay licked." Besides, it isn't safe to trust appearances. Every republican should work from now until the polls close on the night of November 6, as if the success of the ticket and the platform depended upon his individual effort.

Every man who has the love of home and country thoroughly at heart will not only vote the straight republican ticket this fall but he will be willing to devote one day to the service of his country by working at the polls on election day for the success of the republican party, the party that is working for the protection of home and country. In the dark days of war, from 1860 to 1865, thousands of patriotic men were called upon to leave their homes to go upon the bloody field of battle, there to risk their lives and many to lose life itself to protect our homes and country. Thousands of patriotic men this fall are called upon to perform a duty of the same nature—to protect our homes and country, but in this case no one is called upon to lay down his life. But the duty is just as binding. The protection of home and country is just as sacred a duty to-day as it was then and every true man should be willing and anxious to spend the day in the service of that party whose watch-word is "The Protection of Home and Country." Vote the straight republican ticket and work for it all day and again will the country be saved from its enemies.

The Times says that THE JOURNAL has ceased to defend Sheriff Paulsrud. Ceased to defend him from what, Mr. Times? Of what does he stand accused? And by whom? Mr. Paulsrud is the nominee of the republican party and as such has the honest, earnest support of every republican in the county and we see no good reason why all such can not heartily support him at the polls. The Times objects to Mr. Paulsrud for the very reason that it objects to every republican candidate—because he is a republican candidate. If there was any other reason why Mr. Paulsrud should not be elected the Times would not have waited this long before parading it before the public—that it may trump up some false accusations against him when too late for contradiction is not improbable, but no honest man will be deceived by such low-lived trickery. Mr. Paulsrud has served this county to the best of his ability for one term, has become familiar with the duties of the office and we can see no earthly reason for putting him out of office to try a man who has had no experience in the business. Vote for Paulsrud.

We ask every candid temperance man to seriously consider the question: "What earthly good can a vote for the prohibition ticket do the temperance cause this fall?" In the very nature of the case a third party vote is a half vote direct for the democratic party, a party that not only never did anything for the cause of temperance but whose platform declares in positive terms against all sumptuary laws, or any effort of the people to break the rum power. The advocates of the liquor interest are anxious to see a large third party vote cast, knowing that if enough are cast to defeat the republican party they are all right for four years at least. Now, the simple fact is that no good can come to the temperance cause by voting the third party ticket this fall and great good will come to it by voting the republican ticket and every temperance man acting with the republican party. The republican party is in sympathy with temperance and is the only party that has any chance of success, and in order to make any advance whatever in that direction every honest temperance man has no choice but to support that party. You can not change that fact however much you desire to do so and the question you have to consider is whether you will accept the only chance you have to help your cause or whether you will deliberately vote to help your enemy. A vote for the third party is a vote for the liquor interest, even though you may consider it an indirect one and if it is a sin to do anything to help the liquor interest it is a sin to vote the third party ticket, for all the third party can accomplish in this contest is to help the liquor interest. Every earnest, honest man should consider well this proposition, and if he cannot do all the good he would like to should be willing and anxious to do all the good he can. Vote the third party ticket and help to perpetuate the liquor power or the republican ticket and make a little progress in the right direction.

Some say there isn't as much enthusiasm among republicans as four years ago. They ought to remember that it is ballots, not enthusiasm, that figures in the count on election night. The moral is apparent.

Some reformers need nothing so much as reform, and some newspapers rarely dabble in news. As an instance of the latter, here are our (dem.) contemporaries refusing to print General Harrison's speeches, when he says new things every day, and things, too, in which the whole nation is interested.

General Harrison's speeches are like bugle blasts. You do not have to read them twice to be sure you get the sense aright. He says what he has to say in clear, plain, forcible Anglo-Saxon, and the boy just beginning to take an interest in politics can understand the meaning as easily as the gray-beard of sixty winters. His speeches are an epitome of republican doctrines.

The republican party has never been in any sense the friend or ally of the whisky power. As the Danville, Indiana, Republican observes, "there is not a leading republican daily in the whole country that has not from time to time furiously assailed the saloons. All the prohibition laws ever enacted in the loyal states were enacted by republicans—always in spite of democratic opposition. All high license laws and resolutions have been the work of republicans. Who ever heard of a democratic law designed to restrict the sale of whisky?"

The Potsdam, New York, Herald, tells of a republican pole-raising in that state, where, just as all was ready, a prominent citizen and democrat stepped forward and said: "Gentleman! I desire that no republican hand should be applied to the raising of this pole. There are here nineteen democrats who crave the honor of doing the job." And so it was done. The republicans stood back and the nineteen democrats raised it, as a declaration of their purpose to vote for Harrison and Morton and protection.

The democratic papers still continue to howl "monopoly candidate" against Hon. S. G. Comstock, hoping thereby to deceive voters who may be thoughtless or careless. What reason have they for these assertions and what truth is there in them? The republican party took hold of the questions of vital interest to farmers and introduced bills which were intended to give relief. One was the bill creating the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners. Mr. Chas. Canning, elected on the republican ticket, as a republican worked hard for this bill and claims to great credit from the farmers because he did so. The democratic party in their platform and through their press condemns this act of the legislature reviling and abusing it to the extent of their ability and nominated a man for congress who helped to pass the bill, and Mr. Chas. Canning now stands upon a platform that condemns everything he ever tried to do in the interest of the farmer, is the candidate for congress to-day of the very men whom in '84 he so bitterly cursed calling them every opprobrious epithet that he could think of, saying that they were the bitterest kind of foes to this country. To-day he is the candidate of and it is their money that largely supplies the campaign fund. Mr. Comstock, on the other hand, is now doing just what he did then in his quiet, effective manner, working hard in the interest of the farmer against monopoly. He is the candidate of the party that is the author of every good measure ever passed in the interest of the farmer and it is just such men as Mr. Comstock who ever acquire influence in legislative bodies sufficient to accomplish anything. He is the only man of the three candidates fitted by a liberal education and long experience for the duties of the office, and it is for this fact that the democrats made such a howl, trying to blind the eyes of the voters to Mr. Comstock's merits, in order to elect their man. They deliberately go to work to sacrifice the best interests of the district to a paltry party triumph. Their best men know this and will not vote for Canning under any circumstances. They boldly declare this and the party lash has no power to change them or even to make them keep still about it. The people of the 5th will elect Mr. Comstock, and they will do well, for he is a most worthy successor to our present member, Mr. Nelson, who heartily endorses him. He should be elected by a rousing majority and no doubt will.

Somebody in the last issue of the Times rushes valiantly to the rescue of Bro. Canning by attacking THE JOURNAL, but is very evidently ashamed of himself as he hides his identity under the nom de plume of "Voter." Even he cannot disprove one word we said nor does he attempt it but thinks by kicking up a dust to blind the eyes of voters to the glaring imperfections of his man, hoping some may be deluded into voting for Canning. He says he knows nothing about that memorable committee meeting at St. Paul, when Jas. J. Hill was invited to attend a meeting of the House committee on railroads, and the intemperate language used by Mr. Canning on that occasion. That only proves that "VOTER" is wilfully blind to the facts or else that he knows nothing at all about what did occur at that session of the legislature, and for that reason is incapable of forming a correct estimate of Canning's works pro or con. If he was he would no doubt have shown by Canning's illustrious services (?) wherein THE JOURNAL erred and he would not have been ashamed to sign his name to the article, which bears the ear marks of the same individual who attempted in the same sheet to call us to account for our report of the "Castor Oil" convention.

Moorhead News: The resolutions passed at Detroit, assail Mr. Comstock as a friend of monopolies and as not in sympathy with the common people. Mr. Comstock is directly from the ranks of the common people, he having worked with a shovel on the railroad as it was being built to Moorhead in 1871. He is deserving of credit for having advanced to his present position of prosperity and honor. He has been prudent, temperate and industrious, and has made the most of his opportunities, using the talent which had been given him and not hiding it. His record is honest and honorable, and his connection with the Manitoba road is such as any man could honestly and honorably accept. See what Hon. Knute Nelson says about this in another place. He with his partner has secured right of way for that company through unsettled and unknown regions, have purchased land for townsites along said route and laid them out, taking all risks in the development of the of the country, and by its settlement alone and its success, could they expect to receive any return on their investments. If they have made money it is owing to their foresight and the rapid settlement and development of the country. We do not believe Comstock's record in the legislature can be shown otherwise than honest and honorable, as it has been brilliant.

When the Chicago convention named its ticket, it unconsciously put into it the great issues of the campaign, as thus:

H ARRISON — M ORTON
H OME. — M ARKET.

H stands for Harrison, happiness and health; while M is for Morton, with ability and wealth; P's for protection, pie, plenty and pelf; and together they're all for pork, potatoes, peaches, preserves, potpie, pudding and a whole lot of good things, that the emigrant comes to protected America to get.

Ten Reason why I am a Republican.

Northfield News:

I am a Republican by hereditary influence, past environments and present convictions. Because—

First—The Republican party in the past has stood for all that was liberal and progressive in legislation.

Second—The Republican party freed the slave.

Third—The pronounced and emphatic legislation on moral questions has come and most largely from Republican legislators.

Fourth—The Republican party has always been the champion of protection—protection to the citizen, protection to the negro, protection to the ballot-box, protection to the wage corner, protection to wage payer, and now, right in line with its past professions and performances, it declares protection to the home.

Fifth—The friends of the liquor interest in the ranks of the Republican party are few and far between.

Sixth—The Republican has stood for the most advanced temperance legislation which the people have demanded and in very many states has made open declarations of enmity against the saloon.

Seventh—The Republican party deals with conditions of the temperance work, not theories. The ideal is not always instantly attainable; it is better that the majority of the great, struggling, groaning mass should gain one inch of altitude than that a few should by separating themselves into a "holier-than-thou" party attain supernal heights.

Eighth—The Republican party by reason of its powerful position in this country is able to consistently promise the redemption of its pledge, while the so-called Prohibition party ever if the sincerity of its pledges be admitted, cannot for many years at least, fulfil one of them.

Ninth—The best types of American manhood are represented in the persons of Benjamin Harrison and Levi P. Morton.

Tenth—The record of the Republican party proves it to be made up of men out of whose heart and brain reform have come in the past and are likely to come in the future.

J. ELLEN FOSTER.

Marshall County Leader: Let the people remember that Eugene M. Wilson, the democratic candidate for governor, while he was a member of congress went back on the people and voted against the prairie settlers on the question of the Northern Pacific railway lands. He also voted against the interests of the people in the matter of regulation of freight and passenger rates on the same railroad, by congress. This is no campaign lie to hurt Wilson, but the cold truth which can be verified by the congressional record.

Marshall County Leader: Mr. Geo. R. Roberts, the republican candidate for member of the legislature, is gaining ground wherever he has been, as everyone who knew him was certain he would do. It is very gratifying to his friends and neighbors to find that he is making so strong a run. Mr. Roberts has spent the week in Polk County and has had a rousing reception everywhere. His election is a foregone conclusion.

Duluth Herald: Roswell G. Horr, that brilliant campaigner who made a number of speeches in Minnesota several weeks ago has been hard at work ever since, having stumped Wisconsin, Maine, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York Michigan, and Indiana and is still continuing the good work. In a private letter to Minnesota friend he has given his private candid opinion of what the outcome will be. He predicts that the Republicans will carry every northern state. He estimates Harrison's majority over Cleveland in Indiana at 10,000, in Michigan at 15,000, in Wisconsin at 25,000, in Connecticut at 5,000, and in New York at about 20,000. New Jersey he regards as about even with good chances for a mall Republican majority.

The Temperance Party.

The Prohibitionist Shown to have Steadily Hindered the Prohibition Cause.

Prof. J. T. Duffild, D. D., of Princeton, asks the question "ought temperance men to vote with the third party?" in the last Independent, and answers it in the negative. He says:

"Whether a prohibition party is the only way to secure prohibitory legislation is not a question of theory, to be decided by reasoning; it is a simple question of fact, to be decided by reference to the record.

The prohibition party was organized in 1869. Prior to 1869 a prohibitory law had been enacted in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska and Kansas—that is, in sixteen states. My authority for this statement is, 'The World Almanac,' for 1887. In some of these states the law was declared unconstitutional, in others it was subsequently repealed, in others modified by local option amendment, in others it remains in force to the present day. Now, in view of these facts, what becomes of your conclusion based on the assumption that there can be no prohibitory legislation except by a prohibition party?

Further, since the organization of the prohibition party local option prohibitory laws have been enacted in New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas and Missouri—fifteen states. How much, or rather how little, the prohibition party had to do in securing this legislation is indicated by the fact that in the states mentioned, in 1884, out of a total vote of 3,205,524, the prohibition candidate for the presidency received 21,578 votes—that is one vote out of every 150. Again I ask, in view of these facts, what becomes of the conclusion based on the assumption that there can be no prohibitory legislation except by a political party specially organized for the purpose?"

"In Maine, Kansas and Iowa, prohibition has been adopted by decided majorities. And yet in 1884, out of a total vote in these states of 771,219, the prohibition candidate for the presidency received just 9,569 votes—that is, 1 vote out of 90. Supposing prohibition adopted in these states by a bare majority, the prohibition candidate received but one vote out of every 45 pronounced prohibitionists.

The question as to the expediency of a prohibition party has also, as it seems to me, been settled by the test of experiment.

The party has been in existence for nearly twenty years. Prohibitory laws have been passed in thirty-one of the thirty-eight states of the Union. In no single instance has this prohibitory legislation been due to the prohibition party. In most cases these laws have been passed by legislators elected in spite of the opposition at the ballot-box of rum-sellers and party prohibitionists. So far as I am informed, not a single vote for a prohibitory law has ever been cast by a legislator elected by the prohibition party. The only effect of the party as a factor in politics, in the northern states, has been to draw off votes from the party to which we are mainly indebted for prohibitory legislation and thus occasionally elect the candidates of the party avowedly opposed to prohibitory legislation. The prohibition party therefore is rather a hindrance than a help to the cause of prohibition."

"Cheapest and best" is a combination as difficult as it is desirable: but "Peterson's Magazine" has certainly accomplished it. The November number is a gem in every respect. In addition to a lovely steel-engraving, there are three full-page wood-illustrations. One of these is an admirable portrait of Bismarck, who forms the subject of the opening article, which is capitally illustrated and gives various interesting incidents of his life new to American readers. The stories are by popular authors and are put up to the usual high standard of excellence. In the fashion department, beside the handsome double fashion plate, there are scores of dainty dress-patterns and designs for the work-table, etc., many of them suggestive of very pretty Christmas presents. It is time to think of a magazine for next year, and we cannot too heartily recommend "Peterson." It stands high among the literary monthlies; and, as a fashion-periodical, none can equal it. Every lady should take "Peterson." The terms are only two dollars per year, with greatly reduced rates when taken in clubs, and with unusually fine premiums to those getting up clubs, viz: Three copies for $4.50, with the beautifully illustrated book of poems, "Buds and Blossoms," or a large engraving, "The Morning Greeting," for premium; four copies for $6.40, or six copies for $9.00, with an extra copy, free, for one year; or five copies for $8.00, or seven copies for $10.50, with both an extra copy of the magazine and either "Buds and Blossoms" or the engraving as premiums. For larger clubs, still greater inducements. Any lady can, with a little effort, secure one or more of these premiums. Specimens sent free to those who desire to get up clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

CROOKSTON, MINN., OCTOBER 25.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

How Maine Went.

Minneapolis Tribune: Just for the encouragement of the democratic brethren, who still continue to discuss the political situation down in Maine, the Tribune desires once more to call the attention of the world to the central facts of the situation.

1. Every congrssional district in the state who carried by an average plurality of about 5,000.

2. Every county in the state elected, for the first time in years, a republican to the state senate.

3. Every county in the state also gave a plurality for the state ticket.

4. The plurality in the entire state was about 22,000.

5. The majority over all was something less than 18,000; when the republican managers gave it out cold a few days before the electon that they confidently expected 12,000.

6. The total Prohibition vote in Maine—the mother of the Prohibition movement—was 2,000.

Now, it is not worth while for our democratic friends to get out of temper and sulk. The truth is that four years of democratic experiment has furnished sufficient amusement for the American people, and they have determined to quit, and return to the virtuous in government.

Why Blaine is Abused.

St Pull Dispatch.

It was a matter of inquiry among the curious during the early stages of the present campaign why the administration advocates should concern themselves with such apparent bitterness of feeling about the character and conduct of James G. Blaine. He had not received his party's nomination, and he had declined to participate, by the indication of personal preference or otherwise, in the work of choosing the party's candidate. He had, to be sure, committed the unpardonable offense of answering the challenge to "a fight of extermination" embodied in the president's message, with such force and eloquence as to arouse the attention of two continents; but for all the purposes of actual political warfare Mr. Blaine occupied, and has continued to occupy the position of a private citizen.

No sooner had the vessel which carried Mr. Blaine entered New York harbor, however, than at once the chorus of denunciation and criticism broke forth, and it has since continued with unabated unreason and virulence.

The explanation has been provided. Every word which Mr. Blaine has since spoken in behalf of the republican candidacy has gone to the very pith and marrow of the perverted facts and false reasoning of the free trade cause.

The day he arrived he spoke these words in the presence of assembled thousands in New York city:

"This question, from first to last, from beginning to end, from skin to core, and from core back to skin again, is a question of labor. If you will agree to live in as poor houses and eat as poor food and receive as low wages as the operatives in England receive, we can produce just as cheap goods as the democratic administration wants to see. But if you perfer, with the pride and freedom and the great aspirations of an American citizen, to better the condition of your children and of your children's children after you, you want the industrial system of protected interests that prevails in this country now to be maintained."

Since that day he has continued his down-pour of unanswerable facts and figures. He has held the public mind fast to the demonstrated truth that the present is a contest between the civilization of the old and of the new. No sophistry has been sufficiently well-conceived that he has not exposed it; and no pretence which would lead men away from the supreme question of labor and its compensation—the only one involved in this campaign—has remained a day unchallenged. In New York in Maine and in Michigan he has spoken words which, as they have fallen from his lips, have found instant repetition in enduring print.

It should not remain a matter of surprise that this man is the object of the sneers and bitter flings of an adversary which he has done so much to baffle. It is not, perhaps until after he has passed away that his countrymen will realize the value of the services which he has renderd; and whether Gen. Harrison win or be beaten Mr. Blaine's fame as a statesman has become enlarged and amplified, so as to enroll him among the foremost few that have illuminated the path of progress and civilized freedom on the American continent.

Democratic idea of Prohibitionists?

Kelly and Doran's organ, the St. Paul News says edatorially: The Prohibitionists are in the saddle.

They are making things hum in Minnesota.

They are large, very large and sharp, very sharp thorns in the side of the republican party. They are going to poll a pretty respectable vote this year. Don't forget this in any calculation you make on the coming election.

We have had occasion to point out a variety of reason why democratic success in Minnesota is assured this fall. Another and most important feature of the situation is the Prohibition vote. It is safe to say that nine-tenths of the Prohibition votes will come from the republican party. How many will that be?

Well, that's a matter for conjecture, but it will most certainly run up among the thousands. Doesn't this look like another nail in the republican coffin? Doesn't this point toward democratic success?

The Prohibitionists, as a rule, are not democrats in Minnesota, but they are doing yeoman service for the democratic party this year. The "cold water cranks" are on the move. They are making all the converts possible among the republicans. They are making it hot for the republicans hotter than they ever made it before.

The death-knell of republicanism in Minnesota has sounded.

Get the corpse ready for burial.

Duties Reduced by Republicans.

Boston Journal.

One of the democratic party's favorite modes of attempting to impose upon uninformed voters is to assert that our present tariff is a "war" tariff, and that the republicans never have consented and never will consent to change it. How false such assertion are the Nashua (N. H.) Telegraph very neatly shows in this compact statement of some of the tariff changes for which the republican party is responsible:

The republican party reduced the duty on steel rails from $22 to $17.

The republican party abolished the duty on hides.

The republican party abolished the duty on nutmegs.

The republican party put shellac on the free list

The republican party put tin bars on the free list.

The republican party abolished the duty on anthractic coal and reduced the duty on bituminous from $1.25 to 75 cents per ton.

These are some of the things which the Bourbon shriekers about the "war tariff" never refer to.

Come up, Mr. Brice.

The Indianapolis Journal is out of patience with the democrats, who are daily misrepresenting General Harrison, It says:

"We challenge any reputable or responsible democrat to father the 'dollar-a-day' lie that is being circulated. They dare not do it. They prefer to act the part of a 'fence' among sneak-thieves, handling and disposing of goods stolen by others. The Journal has nothing to do with brainless and characterless scamps or irresponsible liars and libelers; but if any responsible person or representative of any responsible organization, on behalf of the democratic party, will come to the front and father this lie we will give them a chance to prove it very quick. But, of course, the responsible leaders of the party will not do it. They would rather hide behind an anonymous libel which they know to be false, and put forward notorious cranks and professional liars to do the dirty work they are willing to profit by. The work they are engaged in is morally as base as uttering forged paper or passing counterfeit money, the only difference being that the latte would subject them to a legal penalty. But some men regulate their moral principles by the penal code, and regard everything as honorable that is not punished by fine and imprisonment."

A "FIGHT TO THE DEATH" ON HOME INDUSTRIES.

Senator Vest's attempt to explain his "fight to the death" letter shows simply (says the Chicago Tribune) that while he confidentially advises his democratic constituents in Missouri that the democratic party is struggling for free trade pure and simple, he doesn't want to be quoted publicly to that effect in other States—in Pennsylvania, New York, and Connecticut, for instance. In writing to the Vest democratic club of St. Louis, the senator frankly said Mr. Cleveland "had challenged the protected industries of the country to a fight of extermination," and Mr. Vest properly added: "It is useless for us to disguise the fact that the fight is to the death, and we would be idiots to ignore this." This letter was put in typewriting, with careful pen and ink additions and corrections. Mr. Vest does not attempt to deny the letter, but pleads that it was "written hurriedly without any idea that it would ever be published or that it would ever be subjected to any public criticism." Vest does not seem to understand that these are the circumstances which make his letter interesting and valuable. The fact that he unbosomed himself frankly and without reserve and wrote "as one confidential friend would write to another," is precisely what gives significance and importance to his letter

Vest should preserve a copy of his letter, for in the event of a democratic victory this fall he could use it to prove that free trade had triumphed at the polls and the democratic party was committed to a "fight to the death" against protected interests. If Cleveland shall be re-elected every free-trader in the United States will shout himself hoarse over the triumph of his doctrine. Vest himself would be the first in such an event to unfurl the black flag and insist on "a fight of extermination" against the protected industries of the north and east. Vest could use his letter to prove that during the campaign he had committed himself over his own signature and in plain black and white to the doctrine of absolute free trade and he had been sustained by Missouri and the south—the portion of the country long accustomed to serve black labor, and which desires now cheap goods without any regard to the effect in reducing the wages of workmen. Vest "told the truth" when he said the fight was one for free trade pure and simple, and he should stick to his text.

Synopsis of Proposed Constitutional Amendments, prepared By the Attorney General, pursuant to Chapter 157, of General Laws of 1887.

The Legislature of 1887 provided for submitting certain amendments to the State Constitution, to be submitted at the general election to be held in 1888.

The proposed amendments to the provisions of the Constitution to be affected thereby are as follows:

Chapter 1, of the General Laws of 1887, provides that the following amendment to Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that the said article be amended by adding thereto the following additional section, to be numbered as Section 35: "SEC. 35. Any combination of persons, either as individuals or as members or officers of any corporation to monopolize the markets for food products in this State, or to interfere with or restrict the freedom of such markets is hereby declared to be a criminal conspiracy, and shall be punished in such manner as the Legislature shall provide."

The ballots to be used in voting upon this Amendment shall be as follows: First, ballots in favor of the amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to freedom of markets —Yes." Second, ballots used against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to the freedom of markets—No."

Article 4 of the Constitution, of which the above section is proposed as an amendment comprises the constitutional provisions relating to the legislative department of the State, and at present contains no provision relating to combinations sought to be prohibited by the proposed amendment.

Section 12 or Article 1 of the State Constitution now reads as follows: "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in this State, and this shall not prevent the Legislature from providing for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt, and a reasonable amount of property shall be exempt from seizure and sale for the payment of any debt or liability. The amount of such exemption shall be determined by law."

It is proposed to amend this as follows: Chapter 2 of the General Laws of 1887 provides that the following amendment to Section 12 of Article 1, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the voters of this State at the next general election, to-wit: "Provided, however, that all property so exempted shall be liable to seizure and sale for any debts incurred to any person for work done or material furnished in the construction, repair or improvement of the same. And, provided further, that such liability to seizure and sale shall also extend to all real property for any debt incurred to any laborer or servant for labor or service performed.

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed, or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to Section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State for protection of the rights of working men or women—Yes." The ballots to be used in voting against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to Section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State, for protection of the rights of working men or women—No."

The effect of this amendment will be to render all property liable for debts incurred for work done or materials furnished in the construction, improvement or repair of such property.

Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, now reads as follows: SECTION 1. Legislature, Session. The Legislature of the State shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives and shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law, and no session shall exceed the term of sixty days."

It is proposed to amend this section as follows: Chapter 3 of the General Laws of the State of Minnesota of 1887, provides that the following amendment to Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that said section shall be amended so as to read as follows:- "SECTION 1. The Legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety legislative days, and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the Governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the Legislature shall be called to some matter of general interest by a special message of the Governor."

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—Yes," and ballots to be used in voting against said amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—No."

The Constitution at present provides for biennial sessions, and the effect of this last amendment will be to continue biennial sessions, but instead of such sessions being limited to sixty days, as they are now, they would be limited to ninety days, and no bill could be introduced during the last twenty days except as provided for in such amendment

Dated July 1st, 1888.

MOSES E. CLAPP,
Attorney General.

Honest and Just.

Some time ago a certain Fifth district farmer wrote to Knute Nelson in regard to the congressional contest and the following reply was received:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.

Dear Sir: Yours of the 17th has just reached me here at Alexandria. I have nothing to say against Mr. Canning as a man or a democrat. But I think there is no excuse or occasion for any republican to oppose Mr. Comstock. I have known him well and intimately since 1875 and have found him always honest, able and reliable. We have no better nor abler man in our district. There is nothing but mere politics in the hue and cry that he is a railroad man. The same cry was made against me when I first ran. But I think no respectable man can now be found who will say I have been the tool of the railroads. On all questions between the public and the railways I have always been on the side of the public, and I feel certain—as certain as I would be of myself—that Mr. Comstock will under all circumstances be on the side of the public, and that no railroad can use him for any unjust or improper purpose. Mr. Comstock is one of those men who are constitutionally and organically honest and just, and a man so constituted is always safe and can always be depended upon, Yours truly,

KNUTE NELSON.

The Press: Since Cleveland has been President and Hill has been Governor neither has been for a moment suspected of personal corruption.

If it is not personal corruption to pay one's personal note for $10,000 with the profits of a contract awarded through personal favoritism and sublet with personal knowledge in violation of law that person in question is personally sworn to execute, then what is?

Fergus Falls Journal: No one who heard Senator Comstock Thursday night could fail to see that he is a sincere, earnest, candid man. There is no demagogue about him. He does not appeal to the prejudice, but to the reason of his fellow citizens. He appreciates the blessings of his country and takes a broad view of the questions affecting it.

Amendment of Article four (4) of the constitution by adding thereto a new section in relation to freedom of markets.—Es.

Amendment to Sec. twelve (12) Article one (1) of the constitution of this state, for protection of rights of working men or women—YES.

For the amendment of Sec. one (1) Article four (4) of the constitution of this state, Providing for biennial sessions of the legislature—YES.

The canvas on the republican side has been a steadily growing one. Can't you help to make it grow more? There is still some time remaining. Individual effort is a great factor.

We are told that the reduction in the Mills bill from 27 to 42 per cent. is a little thing. Does anybody believe the whole democratic chances are staked on a little thing? Once in the right direction by popular approval, the party of Mills, Carlisle and Cleveland will take as long a step as they like.

Cincinnati Times: The democratic campaign editors have at last found their natural level. They have abandoned the tariff, civil service reform and all other campaign issues, and are concentrating their mighty intellects on Anna Dickinson's bustle.

The republicans of Indiana are making a glorious struggle. They have had occasion to rejoice in the choice made for the republican candidate for the presidency, and they have never for an instant flinched in the fight, or faltered in the confidence that they would win it. One thing promises republican victory with a precision that carries conviction. It is that all the well-informed republicans know friends who voted for Cleveland and propose to vote for Harrison. These men are named all over the state.

Chairman Brice, of the democratic national committee, says he is "getting complaints from all over the country that President Cleveland is not doing anything to encourage the boys." Well, it is no wonder. He went fishing on Decoration Day, and that didn't please 'em. Then he ordered the rebel battle flags to be returned, and the boys set up such a howl that he was compelled to rescind his order. We refer to the soldier boys. It may be that Chairman Brice refers to some other kind of "boys."

R. Q. Mills says: "With a cup of free coffee I drink to the health of the democratic party."

Who made coffee free? What party took the duty off coffee? The republican party. If the democratic party had their way a duty would again be placed on tea and coffee, the sugar duty would be increased, and the duty on every article produced in this country—that is to say, every duty that protects any American producer or worker—would be cut down below the revenue point, or swept away altogether. This is the sort of friendship for American industry which the democratic party entertains.

So long as Col. Henry Watterson goes around the country making speeches for Grover Cleveland and the Mills bill voters should keep in mind these choice extracts from his editorials in the Louisville Courier-Journal:

"We demand tariff reform and we set our faces in the direction of free trade."

"The conflict between free trade and protection is irrepressible and must be fought out to the bitter end. We spit upon compromises and propose neither to ask nor to give quarter."

"The democratic party, except in the person of imbeciles hardly worth mentioning, is not upon the fence. It is a free trade party or it is nothing."

"The black flag is up. No quarter will be asked and no quarter will be given."

Democracy's Last Resort.

Information is sent out on reliable authority that the democrats are preparing to resort during the closing weeks of the campaign to methods of falsehood, fraud and forgery in the most unblushing and unscrupulous manner. The information comes from reliable democratic sources, and can be depended upon as true, so far as democratic intentions go. The tide of political drift has been steadily away from the democratic party. Each week of the campaign has witnessed new accessions to the republican ranks, and corresponding gloom and depression at democratic headquarters. Grown desperate by the prospect of defeat, the democratic managers are preparing to employ the most infamous methods that can be devised. They will wait until the campaign is nearly over, so late that they can hope that their despicable plans cannot be exposed, and then will rely upon foul means to secure what they cannot hope to get by fair ones. It is intimated that forgeries will be put forth beside which the Morey letter forgery of 1880 will seem a trivial affair. It should not be forgotten that the chairman of the democratic national committee is the same man who, as chairman in 1880, boldly proposed to buy the electoral vote of Oregon. It should not be forgotten that the author of the Morey letter was a democrat, hired by democratic money. It should not be forgotten that the democratic is the only party that ever has attempted to carry elections by fraud and violence, and then boasted of the fact. It should not be forgotten that having had a taste of the delights of power, the democrats are more fierce for its continuance than they were for its possession four years ago. And remembering these things, it behooves all good citizens to be on their guard from now till election against any desperate measures which the democrats may undertake. Republican speakers and republican papers should warn their hearers and readers to be prepared for a flood of democratic forgeries and falsehoods in the closing week of the campaign. The fact that democratic sensations and pretended discoveries are held back till then, should be in itself evidence of their falseness. The people know by this time the issue between the parties. Any attempt to spring startling sensations of a personal nature near the close of the campaign should be promptly denounced as forgeries and falsehoods. Such roorbacks we have reason to believe are being held back for that purpose. Let the people therefore be on their guard. If prepared for such displays of democratic desperation, they will not be deceived. The prospects are very bright for republican success. Let every republican speaker warn the people against the desperate schemes of the opposition, and by being forewarned they will be forearmed.

A Manly Avowal.

Mr. Morton, in his letter of acceptance, tells where he stands and why, as follows:

For myself, as a citizen and as a candidate, I do not hesitate to declare that from long observation I am an unwavering friend of the protective system. In a business life now extending over forty years I have witnessed and compared the effect upon the country of a revenue tariff tending to free trade with a protective tariff encouraging home industries. Under the former the development of the country has always been arrested, while under the latter it has uniformly been promoted.

To the men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows the difference between the two systems is that of narrowing chances on the one hand and expanding opportunities on the other. Free trade would open competition with the whole world. Protection reserves America for Americans, native and adopted.

The industrial system of a country is as sensitive as its public credit. A hostile movement creates distrust in the public mind, and confidence, the only basis of successful trade, becomes impaired. New enterprises wither in the bud, capital grows timid, the field of labor is contracted, and pressure for employment inevitably reduces the wages of all workingmen.

THE AMERICAN CREED.

We believe in a free ballot and in having every vote counted.

We believe in protection for protection's sake, and we are not ashamed of it.

We believe in abolishing internal taxes created for war purposes.

We believe in the direct protection of American labor against cheap foreign labor.

We believe in free internal competition.

We believe in railroad regulation.

We believe in homesteads and good homestead titles for citizens.

We believe in home rule for big and intelligent territories.

We believe in a double monetary standard.

We believe in the utmost facilities for education, as worth all they can cost.

We believe in a big merchant marine and in American ship yards.

We believe in a good navy, good coast defences and good water routes for commerce.

We believe in making other nations respect our rights and pay for all they get from us.

We believe in protecting American citizens against foreign interference, not only at home, but in any part of the world.

We believe that nothing is too good for the soldiers who risked their lives to save the country, and saved it.

HOW INDIANA WILL GO.

The State Certain for Harrison, Morton and Protection.

An Important Observer Gives his Opinion Especially for our Readers:--The Tariff the Reasons.

Special Correspondence of THE JOURNAL.

INDIANAPOLIS, October 17.—Roger R. Shiel, of Shiel & Co., Union Stock Yards, of this city, is one of the most energetic of the republican workers. He travels considerably through the state, and is brought into contact, daily, with men from perhaps a score of counties. Hence, as he knows almost everybody, and "talks politics" more than anything else, he should be able to form a pretty fair idea of the condition of political affairs here.

"From reports that come to me from all over the state, said Mr. Shiel, "I anticipate a large majority for General Harrison. The changes taking place are in favor of the republican party, in the proportion of about ten to one. In some localities there is a regular stampede from the democratic to the republican ranks, and in many of the old democratic strongholds the old-time majorities will be reduced so that they will be scarcely recognizable, or they will be obliterated entirely. I now feel absolutely certain of this state. While the democrats are bringing in a great deal of money, I believe the majority which will vote for Harrison is now so large that there are not sufficient purchasable votes in the state to overcome it. Of course, we propose to watch matters carefully on election day, and prevent democratic frauds as far as possible. They will attempt to colonize voters, as usual, but our men have so thoroughly familiarized themselves with the various districts, that I do not believe that game can be worked, to any extent, this year.

The democrats themselves are getting discouraged. Those who are posted as to the condition of affairs have stopped betting on the result in Indiana. A few weeks ago, half the democrats wanted to bet; now, those who made bets—many of them—are quietly attempting to 'hedge,' but they find it up-hill work, for now nobody here seems to want to bet on democratic success, either in Indiana or the whole country. The general sentiment among most of the republicans now is that we will carry Indiana by from 10,000 to 15,000 majority. I should not at all be surprised if our majority exceeded the latter figure."

"Where are the gains mostly?"

"They are all over the state. In the new manufacturing districts there will be republican instead of democratic majorities as heretofore. A large portion of the German element is coming over on the protection issue, and there will be at least, double as many Irish votes for the republican candidate as were given in 1884. A great many Irishmen of prominence, who have always worked for the democratic party in years past are now working with us, and are accomplishing grand results. I also know a young German—a workingman—who has a list of nearly one hundred German workingmen whom he has won over. Efforts like that you see amount to something, and such work is going on all over the state."

"What are the principal reasons for the changes?"

"The tariff issue is the main thing that brings us recruits from the democracy, but General Harrison's personal popularity brings us a good many. A large accession from the hitherto democratic Grand Army men is due to Cleveland's pension vetoes. A good many democrats have been influenced against the president, also, on account of his civil service hypocrisy and his prostitution of the administration to secure his re-election. The growing lack of confidence in Cleveland and the firm faith of the people in Harrison are elements which are helping to make a great many republican voter."

Mary's Lamb.

Hudson, (Wis.,) Star and Times.

Even the "kids" snuff victory in the air. The following is from a twelve year old in the eastern part of the county. It is all wool and a yard wide:

Mary had a little lamb,
Its fleece as white as snow;
But Grover in his message says,
That lamb must surely go.

The democrats would turn him out,
And give us English wool;
Close up our factories, rob the poor,
To enrich old Johnny Bull.

But his lambship has a host of friends,
Who have not quite forgotten;
That wool is grown in northern states,
While the south is growing cotton.

Then protection to American homes,
We'll win without a doubt;
And in November Mary's lamb.
Will turn the rascals out.

Henry D. Pierce of Indianapolis, a former law partner of United States senator Turpie, and a nephew of vice-president Hendricks, made speeches in New Hampshire four years ago for Cleveland. The course of Cleveland in the White House displeased Pierce, and this year he is stumping New Hampshire for Harrison. He declares there is a great change in the granite state from four years ago. "Harrison," he says, "will carry every northern state."

Says the Toledo Blade: "The cry of the free traders is that everything is cheaper in free trade England than here, and that the same policy would make clothing and manufactured articles cheaper for our workingmen. Why, then, have 126,247 emigrants come from Great Britain to this country since last New Year's day? If living is cheaper there than here, should not people go from this country to England.

Young Voters, Attention!

There will 2,000,000 young men vote for presidential electors next month who never voted for presidential electors before. These 2,000,000 young voters hold the result of the present contest in their hands. Now as custodians of a trust at once so important and so far reaching, it is their duty to act with thoughtful caution. As young American citizens, you have this responsibility, and in the discharge of it it will not do for you to say that your father acted thus or so. It will not do for you to follow your inclinations solely; to follow your preferences, your prejudices, your sympathies.

Your decision affects your own future. It also affects the future of your neighbor. This is the rub. Here is the moral side of it. You are your brother's political keeper. As a political sentinel—young, patriotic, ambitious—are you going to prove false to your American citizenship at the very outset?

Right down in your heart you have a sympaty for one cause or the other. It is very largely this sympathy that determins whether you are a democrat or a republican. Now what right have you to blindly follow this sympathy, when your act directly affects every other man in the land? You are a sovereign, not a serf. You are sitting in judgment upon the future of your own realm.

You elect a judge to the bench. He follows his prejudices and disregards evidence. You quickly degrade him. Ought not you as electors, who put not only judges upon the bench, but lawmakers in congress and presidents in the White House,—ought not you to be hauled down from your American citizenship if you follow prejudice, and disregard evidence?

You admit that you ought. Of course you do. You are manly Americans, and can't do otherwise. Now let us submit in evidence, three points:

1. That history shows that whenever the strong, national policy, outlined by Hamilton, saved from destruction by Lincoln and Grant, and now represented by the party of Harrison,—whenever this policy has obtained, we have made progress. Why? Because the policy had in it the elements of success; the opposite, or Jeffersonian policy, the elements of failure. You doubt this? Let us beg our judge to lay aside that lurking prejudice, that suggested the doubt, and read our history through clean glasses.

2. That experience proves that our greatest material progress has been made while we shut out products of foreign capital and labor, unless they paid us something for coming in.

3. That wherever there is greatest material accumulation, there is greatest culture, temperance, humanity, piety.

As an impartial sovereign, with a decision in your hand that affects not alone yourself, but me, and not only me, but every other American, you are bound to take this evidence into consideration. Can you gainsay it? If you can find the road to national unity in the precepts of Calhoun; if you can find more material wealth in Virginia and Mississippi than in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania; if you can find the highest culture in the lower wards of New York, and in States where two out of every three men you meet can neither read nor write; if you can do this, then you can conscientiously decide this case in favor of the principles at present represented by Cleveland and Thurman. If you cannot, then as an impartial judge, you are bound to decide it in favor of the principles represented by Harrison and Morton. Bear this in mind: that it is no more a question of men than it is of sympathy. It is a question of principle, not of your prejudice or of your preference.

The republican party has raised the nation from bankruptcy to opulence, and secured for our public credit the faith of the financial world. This was done under protection, and Gen. Harrison helped to do it.

The way to break up the Solid South is to elect Harrison and Morton. If Cleveland gets another term, bourbon democracy will maintain its sway. If Harrison be chosen, the young, the enterprising, the well reconstructed, the protection, the American voters of the new and progressive south will be encouraged to assert themselves.

The tidal wave for Harrison is rising just as rapidly as the similar movement in 1840 which elected to the presidency his illustrous namesake. Then, as now, the country was weary of the democratic administration which insisted upon another four years' control of the government. The demand was indignantly refused. Let's complete the parallel.

Chicago Journal: Since January 1st, 1888, 126,247 persons have left Great Britain and Ireland to settle in the United States. It is singular, if everything is so cheap in that free trade paradise, that so many people leave it for this "blarsted" protection country. The total population of the British Isles is 36,000,000. Almost one half of one per cent. have emigrated to this country within eight months. And yet they can buy carpets cheaper there than here.

The series of extempore speeches delivered by Lincoln while on his way from Springfield to Washington, in the spring of 1861, and the remarkable speeches made by Blaine in the campaign of 1884, are being paralleled by the addresses of General Harrison, since his nomination in July. Indeed, in one respect the present remarkable series made by the republican standard bearer surpass those of both Lincoln and Blaine, in that they are read by so many more people. General Harrison is accomplishing as much for himself, for the ticket, for republicanism and for the country by remaining at home as did Lincoln and Blaine by traveling about. He is stumping the nation by telegraph.

Several times has Gen. Harrison been charged with acts and sayings really performed and said by other Harrisons. At the beginning of the campaign there was a remark about a religious denomination that turned out to have been made by Harrison, the "boy" preacher, and recently in Illinois, there has been a tempest in the democratic teapot over an alleged remark about the Irish-Americans being fit for nothing but hewers of wood and drawers of water. It turns out that Carter Harrison, the notorious democratic ex-mayor of Chicago was the Harrison who thus maligned an excellent class of American citizens. It is about Carter Harrison's size; it is far too small for a great big-hearted American gentleman like Benjamin Harrison.

John F. Henshen is a machinist of Indianapolis, who was recently captain of a democratic campaign club composed mostly of German-American citizens. Some days ago, Mr. Henshen became interested in a tariff discussion, and after reading the documents on both sides, concluded that the protection doctrine suited him the better of the two. He explained his position to his club, from which he proposed to resign his membership, but the members of the club were so impressed with their captain's reasons for leaving the democratic party that the majority of them announced their intention of going with him. And now Mr. Henshen is captain of a republican campaign club. That is a sample of the way the good work is going on in Indiana.

The canvas on the republican side has been a steadily growing one. Can't you help to make it grow more? There is still some time remaining. Individual effort is a great factor.

We are told that the reduction in the Mills bill from 27 to 42 per cent. is a little thing. Does anybody believe the whole democratic chances are staked on a little thing? Once in the right direction by popular approval, the party of Mills, Carlisle and Cleveland will take as long a step as they like.

Cincinnati Times: The democratic campaign editors have at last found their natural level. They have abandoned the tariff, civil service reform and all other campaign issues, and are concentrating their mighty intellects on Anna Dickinson's bustle.

The republicans of Indiana are making a glorious struggle. They have had occasion to rejoice in the choice made for the republican candidate for the presidency, and they have never for an instant flinched in the fight, or faltered in the confidence that they would win it. One thing promises republican victory with a precision that carries conviction. It is that all the well-informed republicans know friends who voted for Cleveland and propose to vote for Harrison. These men are named all over the state.

Chairman Brice, of the democratic national committee, says he is "getting complaints from all over the country that President Cleveland is not doing anything to encourage the boys." Well, it is no wonder. He went fishing on Decoration Day, and that didn't please 'em. Then he ordered the rebel battle flags to be returned, and the boys set up such a howl that he was compelled to rescind his order. We refer to the soldier boys. It may be that Chairman Brice refers to some other kind of "boys."

R. Q. Mills says: "With a cup of free coffee I drink to the health of the democratic party."

Who made coffee free? What party took the duty off coffee? The republican party. If the democratic party had their way a duty would again be placed on tea and coffee, the sugar duty would be increased, and the duty on every article produced in this country—that is to say, every duty that protects any American producer or worker—would be cut down below the revenue point, or swept away altogether. This is the sort of friendship for American industry which the democratic party entertains.

So long as Col. Henry Watterson goes around the country making speeches for Grover Cleveland and the Mills bill voters should keep in mind these choice extracts from his editorials in the Louisville Courier-Journal:

"We demand tariff reform and we set our faces in the direction of free trade."

"The conflict between free trade and protection is irrepressible and must be fought out to the bitter end. We spit upon compromises and propose neither to ask nor to give quarter."

"The democratic party, except in the person of imbeciles hardly worth mentioning, is not upon the fence. It is a free trade party or it is nothing."

"The black flag is up. No quarter will be asked and no quarter will be given."

Democracy's Last Resort.

Information is sent out on reliable authority that the democrats are preparing to resort during the closing weeks of the campaign to methods of falsehood, fraud and forgery in the most unblushing and unscrupulous manner. The information comes from reliable democratic sources, and can be depended upon as true, so far as democratic intentions go. The tide of political drift has been steadily away from the democratic party. Each week of the campaign has witnessed new accessions to the republican ranks, and corresponding gloom and depression at democratic headquarters. Grown desperate by the prospect of defeat, the democratic managers are preparing to employ the most infamous methods that can be devised. They will wait until the campaign is nearly over, so late that they can hope that their despicable plans cannot be exposed, and then will rely upon foul means to secure what they cannot hope to get by fair ones. It is intimated that forgeries will be put forth beside which the Morey letter forgery of 1880 will seem a trivial affair. It should not be forgotten that the chairman of the democratic national committee is the same man who, as chairman in 1880, boldly proposed to buy the electoral vote of Oregon. It should not be forgotten that the author of the Morey letter was a democrat, hired by democratic money. It should not be forgotten that the democratic is the only party that ever has attempted to carry elections by fraud and violence, and then boasted of the fact. It should not be forgotten that having had a taste of the delights of power, the democrats are more fierce for its continuance than they were for its possession four years ago. And remembering these things, it behooves all good citizens to be on their guard from now till election against any desperate measures which the democrats may undertake. Republican speakers and republican papers should warn their hearers and readers to be prepared for a flood of democratic forgeries and falsehoods in the closing week of the campaign. The fact that democratic sensations and pretended discoveries are held back till then, should be in itself evidence of their falseness. The people know by this time the issue between the parties. Any attempt to spring startling sensations of a personal nature near the close of the campaign should be promptly denounced as forgeries and falsehoods. Such roorbacks we have reason to believe are being held back for that purpose. Let the people therefore be on their guard. If prepared for such displays of democratic desperation, they will not be deceived. The prospects are very bright for republican success. Let every republican speaker warn the people against the desperate schemes of the opposition, and by being forewarned they will be forearmed.

A Manly Avowal.

Mr. Morton, in his letter of acceptance, tells where he stands and why, as follows:

For myself, as a citizen and as a candidate, I do not hesitate to declare that from long observation I am an unwavering friend of the protective system. In a business life now extending over forty years I have witnessed and compared the effect upon the country of a revenue tariff tending to free trade with a protective tariff encouraging home industries. Under the former the development of the country has always been arrested, while under the latter it has uniformly been promoted.

To the men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows the difference between the two systems is that of narrowing chances on the one hand and expanding opportunities on the other. Free trade would open competition with the whole world. Protection reserves America for Americans, native and adopted.

The industrial system of a country is as sensitive as its public credit. A hostile movement creates distrust in the public mind, and confidence, the only basis of successful trade, becomes impaired. New enterprises wither in the bud, capital grows timid, the field of labor is contracted, and pressure for employment inevitably reduces the wages of all workingmen.

"Harrison," he says, "will carry every northern state."

Says the Toledo Blade: "The cry of the free traders is that everything is cheaper in free trade England than here, and that the same policy would make clothing and manufactured articles cheaper for our workingmen. Why, then, have 126,247 emigrants come from Great Britain to this country since last New Year's day? If living is cheaper there than here, should not people go from this country to England.

Young Voters, Attention!

There will 2,000,000 young men vote for presidential electors next month who never voted for presidential electors before. These 2,000,000 young voters hold the result of the present contest in their hands. Now as custodians of a trust at once so important and so far reaching, it is their duty to act with thoughtful caution. As young American citizens, you have this responsibility, and in the discharge of it it will not do for you to say that your father acted thus or so. It will not do for you to follow your inclinations solely; to follow your preferences, your prejudices, your sympathies.

Your decision affects your own future. It also affects the future of your neighbor. This is the rub. Here is the moral side of it. You are your brother's political keeper. As a political sentinel—young, patriotic, ambitious—are you going to prove false to your American citizenship at the very outset?

Right down in your heart you have a sympathy for one cause or the other. It is very largely this sympathy that determines whether you are a democrat or a republican. Now what right have you to blindly follow this sympathy, when your act directly affects every other man in the land? You are a sovereign, not a serf. You are sitting in judgment upon the future of your own realm.

You elect a judge to the bench. He follows his prejudices and disregards evidence. You quickly degrade him. Ought not you as electors, who put not only judges upon the bench, but lawmakers in congress and presidents in the White House,—ought not you to be hauled down from your American citizenship if you follow prejudice, and disregard evidence?

You admit that you ought. Of course you do. You are manly Americans, and can't do otherwise. Now let us submit in evidence, three points:

1. That history shows that whenever the strong, national policy, outlined by Hamilton, saved from destruction by Lincoln and Grant, and now represented by the party of Harrison,—whenever this policy has obtained, we have made progress. Why? Because the policy had in it the elements of success; the opposite, or Jeffersonian policy, the elements of failure. You doubt this? Let us beg our judge to lay aside that lurking prejudice, that suggested the doubt, and read our history through clean glasses.

2. That experience proves that our greatest material progress has been made while we shut out products of foreign capital and labor, unless they paid us something for coming in.

3. That wherever there is greatest material accumulation, there is greatest culture, temperance, humanity, piety.

As an impartial sovereign, with a decision in your hand that affects not alone yourself, but me, and not only me, but every other American, you are bound to take this evidence into consideration. Can you gainsay it? If you can find the road to national unity in the precepts of Calhoun; if you can find more material wealth in Virginia and Mississippi than in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania; if you can find the highest culture in the lower wards of New York, and in States where two out of every three men you meet can neither read nor write; if you can do this, then you can conscientiously decide this case in favor of the principles at present represented by Cleveland and Thurman. If you cannot, then as an impartial judge, you are bound to decide it in favor of the principles represented by Harrison and Morton. Bear this in mind: that it is no more a question of men than it is of sympathy. It is a question of principle, not of your prejudice or of your preference.

The republican party has raised the nation from bankruptcy to opulence, and secured for our public credit the faith of the financial world. This was done under protection, and Gen. Harrison helped to do it.

The way to break up the Solid South is to elect Harrison and Morton. If Cleveland gets another term, bourbon democracy will maintain its sway. If Harrison be chosen, the young, the enterprising, the well reconstructed, the protection, the American voters of the new and progressive south will be encouraged to assert themselves.

The tidal wave for Harrison is rising just as rapidly as the similar movement in 1840 which elected to the presidency his illustrous namesake. Then, as now, the country was weary of the democratic administration which insisted upon another four years' control of the government. The demand was indignantly refused. Let's complete the parallel.

Chicago Journal: Since January 1st, 1888, 126,247 persons have left Great Britain and Ireland to settle in the United States. It is singular, if everything is so cheap in that free trade paradise, that so many people leave it for this "blarsted" protection country. The total population of the British Isles is 36,000,000. Almost one half of one per cent. have emigrated to this country within eight months. And yet they can buy carpets cheaper there than here.

The series of extempore speeches delivered by Lincoln while on his way from Springfield to Washington, in the spring of 1861, and the remarkable speeches made by Blaine in the campaign of 1884, are being paralleled by the addresses of General Harrison, since his nomination in July. Indeed, in one respect the present remarkable series made by the republican standard bearer surpass those of both Lincoln and Blaine, in that they are read by so many more people. General Harrison is accomplishing as much for himself, for the ticket, for republicanism and for the country by remaining at home as did Lincoln and Blaine by traveling about. He is stumping the nation by telegraph.

Several times has Gen. Harrison been charged with acts and sayings really performed and said by other Harrisons. At the beginning of the campaign there was a remark about a religious denomination that turned out to have been made by Harrison, the "boy" preacher, and recently in Illinois, there has been a tempest in the democratic teapot over an alleged remark about the Irish-Americans being fit for nothing but hewers of wood and drawers of water. It turns out that Carter Harrison, the notorious democratic ex-mayor of Chicago was the Harrison who thus maligned an excellent class of American citizens. It is about Carter Harrison's size; it is far too small for a great big-hearted American gentleman like Benjamin Harrison.

John F. Henshen is a machinist of Indianapolis, who was recently captain of a democratic campaign club composed mostly of German-American citizens. Some days ago, Mr. Henshen became interested in a tariff discussion, and after reading the documents on both sides, concluded that the protection doctrine suited him the better of the two. He explained his position to his club, from which he proposed to resign his membership, but the members of the club were so impressed with their captain's reasons for leaving the democratic party that the majority of them announced their intention of going with him. And now Mr. Henshen is captain of a republican campaign club. That is a sample of the way the good work is going on in Indiana.

The hotel is conducted on the European plan and the guest can find $5 per day accommodations or one-fifth of that if he likes. OUR TICKET.

On Tuesday next the all-important question will be decided as to the complexion of the government for the next four years. The democratic party has pronounced in favor of free trade and the republican party in favor of a revision of the tariff, such as shall protect the interests of all alike. The candidates on the republican ticket are all honest and true men—worthy the support of all who are in favor of good government. The democrats have searched in vain for one objection against and have utterly failed. In fact, the more their records have been searched the better they appear, so the democrats had to give that up as a bad job, but they have thought to make a governor in this state by raising the cry of "boodle" against the republican candidate for governor,

THE HON. WM. R. MERRIAM.

These charges they have utterly failed to substantiate, because there is no truth in them. Mr. Merriam is one of the brightest young business men in our state, a typical Minnesotian, and the only real charge that has been made against him is that he is "RICH!" Well, now this is a serious charge, truly, and one that no one of his accusers would willingly be guilty of (?) of course! Well, Mr. Merriam is really somewhat to blame for this bad state of things because, not being satisfied with being born to wealthy parents, he, in early life, developed studious, business habits, and by dint of honesty and industry he has added largely to his inherited wealth, when he might just as well have been a lazy, shiftless dude and drank up all of his own share and as much of his father's as he could get hold of. But he choze to do just as every poor boy has to do, devote himself assiduously to business, and now, forsooth, they say "he is wealthy!" Now that we think of it, however, the democratic candidate, Mr. Wilson, is subject to the same charge—he is rich! So the democrats are as deep in the mud as the republicans in the mire, but Mr. Merriam is a common, every-day, social man, while Mr. Wilson is more disposed to be aristocratic. Mr. Merriam has proved by his actions in the legislature his hearty sympathy with the farmer and the laboring man. The balance of the state and judicial ticket is well worthy of hearty support. For Congress no better man could be found than is

THE HON. S. G. COMSTOCK.

He is pre-eminently a man of the people; born and raised on a farm, he knows well the needs of a farmer's life. Always having been obliged to work hard himself, he knows all that labor has to endure. That he worked himself up to competency but shows the innate worth of the man, as he had to do it all unaided. His long experience in the legislature of his adopted state, where he is known as one of the hardest workers ever sent there, has fitted him for further work in congress, and given him an influence there that it would take a new man years to acquire. His competitor, while no doubt a very well meaning man, is by no means as able a man, nor is he one whit more honest. Vote for S. G. Comstock. Our candidate for the legislature, is a plain, honest, well educated farmer. If poverty is a recommend, he has it, and if being a farmer for several years in this country gives a man any idea of what the farmers here need, then Mr. Roberts is the best calculated to serve the people of this district, as his opponent, O. L. Larson, is a young lawyer who has never had any personal experience as a farmer in this country. Mr. Roberts is an intelligent farmer, one who, knowing well what legislation the farmers need, will soon learn how to obtain it for them. He is a man, no farmer, or business man either for that matter, need be ashamed to help to send to the legislature to represent this district. Vote for Geo. R. Roberts. Coming down to the county ticket, for auditor, we find the name of who has been called the best auditor in the state by more than one public examiner. Even the democrats, usually so prolific of fault-finding, could find no fault with McGuire and so endorsed him. For treasurer, deserves fully as much commendation as does Mr. McGuire, as he is fully as efficient in his office, and together they make a team that any county could well be proud of. His nomination in the convention expresses the will of the people and was fairly accomplished, and as he accepted the nomination in good faith, the party should now stand by him in the same spirit. It is not claimed by the opposition that Mr. Lucken is incompetent, and the only thing brought against him is that Mr. Thoreson was a candidate for the nomination and Mr. Lucken got it. If there is anything wrong in that the rupublican party is to blame and not Mr. Lucken at all, for it was the republican party who by a majority vote declared Mr. Lucken its nominee. Unless the party abides the result of a fair convention a party organization is a farce, and every true republican owes it to his party and to his own manhood to sustain the action of that convention with his ballot. Mr. Lucken is not only a true blue republican now, but he always has been. He shouldered his musket in defense of his country at a time when the upholding of the republican principles cost a man something. He is well deserving of the office in every way and should be triumphantly elected, He stood by his country and his party manfully, and now he should not be deserted. Vote for O. H. Lucken. For register of deeds, the present incumbent, is our candidate. So faithful has he been that the democrats could see no chance of defeating him so they endorsed him. His election is a foregone conclusion. For judge of probate, is our nominee. The Judge has served one term well and ably, and with his experience so acquired is better prepared than one who has the business to learn. He is honest, capable and deserving. Vote for C. O. Christianson. For superintendent of schools, is the republican nominee. No higher compliment could be paid any man than was paid him last week by Prof. Hyde, when he urged upon all in attendance at the institute to work for his re-election, saying that he is one of the most efficient superintendents in the state, and that the continued efficiency of our schools demands his retention. His opponent is a lady, who, if any lady could attend to the various duties of the office, doubtless could do as well as any, but the very nature of the duties requiring considerable "roughing it," preclude the possibility of any lady giving the necessary attention. Be sure your ballot has the name of Ezra F. Elliot on it. For county attorney, a rising young attorney of Red Lake Falls, is the nominee. Mr. W. is an excellent attorney, well fitted for the duties of the position and will no doubt be elected by a good majority. For Sheriff, our present sheriff, is the republican nominee, and as such deserves his election. Ever since the nomination the democrats have been loud in preferring charges of a general nature against him, but it is a significant fact, that, try as hard as they have, they have utterly ailed to prove even one of their false assertions. Had there been any fault to find with Mr. Paulsrud the democrats would not have failed to name it and prove it long ago. He has had the benefit of one term's experience, an invaluable aid in the further prosecution of his duties. Vote for Nels O. Paulsrud. For court commissioner, will be elected. He's GOT to be elected, for if he is defeated he will no doubt go to Tacoma to lose the immense wealth he has accumulated in the office of court commissioner of Polk County, so for the protection of home industries we are obliged to re-elect Dave. No better man for surveyor than has ever taken a level in Polk County, and as the dems have endorsed him, he is losing no sleep. As coroner, has faithfully "sat upon" everything that needed sitting upon during the time he has administered the affairs of the office, and as the democrats endorsed him, and the democratic annex also, we feel pretty certain that Shep will keep right on "settin'." There are three amendments to the constitution. The one relating to the freedom of markets is a needed improvement and your verdict should be an emphatic YES. It would be well to look carefully into the next one relating to the protection of the rights of working men and women. It is very desirable to throw every safeguard possible around this class of people, as they constitute the sum of our western population, that is a large majority of our people are working men and women; some are working by the day or month, others are working their little farms trying to extract a living therefrom. Under the present law all such are exempt to a certain extent, and if by some disaster they lose their crops they still have their homestead left. This amendment does away with the protection of the homestead, and looks to us more like class legislation than a law for the best interests of all concerned. The next amendment provides for 90 days session of the legislature instead of 60, as heretofore, and should be voted with a big YES.

GEO. R. ROBERTS,

O. H. LUCKEN

C. O. CHRISTIANSON

EZRA F. ELLIOT

D. D. WILLIAMS,

NELS O. PAULSRUD,

D. E. HATLESTAD

HENRY SHEPARD

We're Going to Win.

Fellow republicans, we're going to win this fight. Why do we say so? Because we have the best men for our nominees.

Because we plead for protection to American homes.

Because we are the progressive party.

Because the people know that the republican party, just so rapidly as it can overcome democratic opposition, always carries out it promises.

But why are we certain about winning?

Because we have it direct from men who ought to know—men who have the vantage ground to view the situation on all sides—men trained by experience in past campaigns and know what to expect in this one—men who hold facts in their hands; facts not always wise to publish at once, but upon which they can safely give a tip to their sentinels.

It is on strength of this tip that we say: We're going to win.

One more point, fellow republicans: Don't stop work yet. There's no fear of that on the part of the leaders; but we are speaking now to the rank and file in the party. Just you go and find some wavering soul, tell him we're going to win ask him to come in out of the wet. Ten to one he'll come, if you ask him cordially. Then, with the wavering souls in, we'll give democracy such a thrashing that it won't dare attack our homes with free trade again in our generation.

Let's make November 6th the Appomattox of free trade.

M. R. BROWN.

The Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler is one of the strongest men of the Presbyterian Church. What he writes in the New York Evanglist concerning Governor Hill's candidacy will have great weight with many people. Dr. Cuyler writes for a religious newspaper and speaks only of the moral issue involved in New York State; therefore he does not commit himself on the matter of presidential candidates. It is quite easy, however, to apply his logic to all the voting of prohibitionists. If voting for the third party candidate for governor will be helping to elect the saloon-keeper's man, voting for the third party candidate for president will be helping to keep in power the party with which, all over the country, the saloon-keepers are identified, and to which they look for the advancement of their interests. Warner Miller but represents his party in arraying himself against the saloon and on the side of good morals, wholesome reform and religion. "For partisan politics I care but little: for the principles that underlie all good government, I care a great deal," says Dr. Cuyler: "great and vital principles are at issue this fall in the state of New York. David B. Hill antagonizes the right of its citizens to secure increased purity of the ballot-box, and their right even to restrict the tyranny of the colossal rum power. He has flung down his defiant challenge! The honest voters of our great commonwealth, will meet and answer his challenge on the sixth of November."

Many prohibitionist's of Indiana, it is said, see the folly of voting for their National and State candidates, and look with much more favor upon General Harrison than on Glover Cleveland as a fit man to be elected. Personally, General Harrison is much more acceptable to Indiana prohibitionists than Fisk himself. they well know his strict integrity, temperance and morality, and while he is not a declared prohibitionist, they regard the great National issues as of paramount importance to this single one upon which their party stands.

The democratic journals are running liberal-sized prohibition departments. Spiders are usually heard only while the fly is consdering their invitation to walk in. Democrats don't mind about being seen by prohibitionists this year. They stand right out in plain view.

Every republican should hitch his enthusiasm to the party engine. There is nothing like concerted action. Ten men pulling together can move an obstruction; pulling individually they cannot stir it. The moral is plain, Vote the straight ticket.

From Maine to the Gulf of California and from Puget Sound to Key West, there is harmony in the republican ranks everywhere, and when the party that was unanimous against slavery, and unanimous against disruption of the Union, and that is unanimous against free trade, and unanimous against Grover Cleveland and his sham reform—when this unanimous republican party's turn comes to speak next Tuesday, somebody will hear something worth listening to. It's a way the unanimous republican party has.

There was no turnig of the sentiment of the country over to democracy in 1884. Nothing of the sort. The republicans lost then by over-confidence —and lost only by the skin of their teeth. There is nothing like a temporary check to send an army of soldiers or of voters together. The republicans had the check, they are now together, and they're going to win.

Look Out For Them.

There has been a lot of tickets printed and distributed without the names of the presidential electors upon them. This is said to be a mistake of the printer, but how any ordinarily intelligent printer could make such a mistake, we fail to see; however, the fact remains that the tickets are in the field, and all who do not want to throw away their vote should be careful not to vote them. The probability is, also, that these tickets do not contain the amendments, all of which are of great importance to the interests of this county. Look out for these tickets. See that your tickets are just like the one at the head of this issue of THE JOURNAL.

Robbed at the Lomer House.

Tom Box kindly sent THE JOURNAL a copy of the Tacoma Ledger, of Oct. 21st from which we take the following item in which two prominent citizens of Crookston play an important part:

R. E. Hussey and W. H. Hurlbut, of Minnesota, were robbed of $316 in money and gold watch and chain, at the Lomer house, in the Ralph block, Ninth and D streets, on Friday night. A search warrant was sworn out before Justice Lawrence yesterday and the house searched, but without any results. Mr. Hurlbut is the mayor of Crookston, Polk County, Minn., and both gentlemen are civil engineers by profession. They are looking around Tacoma with a view of locating here.

If it was not so serious a matter for the boys the joke would be on Hurlbut and Hussey. It seems in the morning after the robbery they found their clothing out in the hall—minus their valuables. When they reported their loss and this fact to the Teutonic landlady she exclaimed "Yah! das vas too t'in, you robs you-ellufs und dries to make ouid I haf to pay dot! I'm onto such rackets!"

The city council at its session on the evening of the 23d adopted the following resolution:

RESOLVED—That the next general election to be held in the city of Crookston on Tuesday November 6th, 1888, be held at the following places:

First ward; in the city hall.

Third ward; in the office at the corner of Third and Broadway, formerly occupied by John N. Ives.

Fifth ward; at the Carman hotel.

LOW RAILROAD FARES.

Canada Excursions.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40,00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th, and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

For through tickets at the lowest rates to all parts of the Continent and full particulars regarding these excursions, call upon or write the nearest ticket agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry., C. H. Mix, agent, Crookston, or to F. I. Whitney, G. P. A., St. Paul. [28-34]

W. J. Nickle will teach the fall term of school in district No. 104, which begins Monday, Nov. 12th. His present term in district No. 67 closes Nov. 9th.

It seems very strange to us that good Christian temperance people cannot see that a vote for the prohibition party means one less for the temperance cause and one more for Cleveland. You may trace the history of temperance legislation in Maine, Kansas, Iowa and Rhode Island, and you will learn that all the laws restraining or prohibiting the liquor traffic have been accomplished by republican legislatures. 'Tis true there are some men in the republican party who are saloon keepers and some who are working in the interest of the saloons, but the great mass are good temperance men and favor all legislation that will control or prohibit the traffic. In fact, nearly all the great leaders (Harrison, Blaine, Hoar, and hosts more) of the republican leaders to-day are teetotalers, whereas the democratic party always was, and is, the friend of the liquor men. Choose ye whom you will serve, for you must serve either the one or the other.

A KISS IN A CANOE.

The maiden sat in a light canoe,
  Afloat on a mountain lake;
And a mad idea shot wildly through
The brain of her lover (who sat there too),
That he, in that self-same light canoe
  A stolen kiss would take.

Now the maiden sat there, unaware
  Of the plot that he had hatched;
And the mountain breezes played with her hair
And fanned her cheek and her brow so fair,
As she sat there quite unaware.
  Of the kiss soon to be snatched.

Then the lover awaited a real good chance,
  To capture the longed-for kiss.
When, watching the wimpling wavelets dance,
She turned her head with a quick, shy glance,
And, leaning back, she gave him a chance
  That was really too good to miss.

So he bent to meet her, and tried to steal
  The kiss that he burned to get.
But he bent so quick, in his ardent zeal,
That the craft upset like a whirling wheel,
And he missed the kiss that he tried to steal,
  And they both got very wet.

TITANE.

Being an Account of the Strange Monster a Botanist Created.

I had never seen her handwriting before; and yet, the instant the letter was brought to me, I knew it was from Paula, whom I had not seen for three long years, in fact, not since she had become the wife of Frederick Wertheim the brilliant botanist whose researches had won the plaudits of the whole scientific world. Paula and I had been friends from childhood, and I had naturally expected to see her handwriting embellished with all manner of capricious little twists and curls; but I knew it was from her as soon as I saw my name on the envelope, despite the hurried, nervous letters, and I felt instinctively that something was amiss.

I broke the seal hurriedly—the sheet bore but two words "come" and her name, "Paula."

Such a request from her was to me an order. I did not hesitate an instant. Paula and her husband lived on a large estate about six miles distant from the city. But my strolls had never led me in that direction; it would have brought up dreams of my childhood that were best forgotten—but there, it does no good to sentimentalize in this fashion. It was early autumn, and I had to urge my horse through a heavy fog. The chateau in which Paula lived was situated at the extremity of an alley of chestnut trees whose boughs interlaced to form a long, dark tunnel. As I entered this alley, it seemed to me that far in the black circle, which looked like the cave of some terrible beast, I could see the vague features of a horrid, grinning mask, shadowy as mist, which menanced me and dared me to come on. The sinister impression of this hallucination was so strong that I drew rein and half stopped, leaning forward on my horse's neck to peer into the profound darkness. Then, driving the spurs deep in my horse's flanks, I dashed into the unknown.

I was almost thrown by the abruptness with which the horse stopped, for just before me was an iron gate, surmounted by a curiously carved head, a masterpiece of the iron-worker's skill, which accounted for my strange illusion of the moment before. And behind the twisted bars of the gate stood Paula awaiting me, her rosy baby in her arms. Even in the darkness I could see that she was very pale and her face showed signs of suffering. I jumped from the saddle, and in an instant was raising to my lips the hand she extended to me.

Arrived at the porch, she stopped a moment as if listening. She could have heard nothing, for she slowly pushed open the heavy door, which swung silently to disclose a heavily carpeted hall. And a moment later we were in a small reception room, lighted by candles which threw a fitful gleam upon our faces.

"Listen."

They were the first words she had pronounced, and the sad tones of her voice told me she had suffered deeply.

"I have summoned you," she went on; "you are the friend of my childhood. The bond between us has been strained, but it is not broken. Three years ago I became Frederick's wife. As a child I had thought of him, whom they already called professor, as a being whom none might disobey; he won me with a word, his glance held me, and I felt myself conquered by his will. My weakness leaned upon his strength, I was proud to bow before this will that seemed to dominate all things. I speak of these matters because it is necessary that you should understand all, for I have sore need of your help."

"Why, what is the matter? Does Frederick dare——"

"Frederick is goodness itself, he loves me—but, I am afraid, I fear—I fear him above all things. Why? Oh, if I could but tell you, if I could but know myself! But this fear which torments me every day, and every night still more, is the more poignant because it is inexplicable!"

"Bah! Terror, fear—these are mere words," said I, lightly, though I was far from feeling at ease.

"Words which sound in our brains, nevertheless, which are intelligible to our reason, which awake dread echoes. Why do you smile? Do you not know that mystery is stronger than reason, that from it arises the anguish of the unknown?"

In spite of myself, in spite of my wish to appear skeptical, I felt most unpleasantly disturbed. Lowering my voice, I interrogated her in a gentler tone. This is what she told me: For six months past, that is to say, since the birth of her child, Frederick who until then had held his head high like a soldier who feels his victory near, had all at once grown nervous. Of what problem was he seeking the solution? What combat had he dared to undertake? He became morbidly silent, and replied to his wife's questions only with haggard looks, as if he begged her not to arouse some distressing memory. For days and nights he remained shut up in a hot-house which he had constructed at great expense in the park. Weeks passed without his appearing at the chateau. Sometimes, in the night, he would creep silently into his wife's chamber. She had watched him while he believed her to be sleeping. She had seen him seated on a lounge, with fixed eyes staring at some fearful vision. There was in his contracted face an expression of indescribable horror. His frame shook, and his hands, agitated in convulsive movement, seemed to repulse some invisible enemy. Then—oh, she had studied him carefully in those brief moments—he had looked up with an imperious, triumphant resolution. Springing suddenly up he had fled—Paula had flown to the window, she had seen him hurry toward the hot-house, where the lights flared always from dusk to dawn like a light-house.

Frankly and boldly she had questioned him. What was going on down there in the park? Why did he so obstinately refuse to let any one enter the hot-house?

With a shudder he had coldly put her aside unanswered.

Then, brave hypocrite that she was, she had tried to fathom the truth. And she had learned a strange thing. Each day Frederick made the Gardner buy many pounds of fresh meat, and himself carried them in the evening to the hothouse. What could he be nourishing there? Was it some dangerous, unknown animal that he was compelled to feed, a creature with which he was resigned to live alone for some scientific purpose? And what was that struggle, to which his rebellions in the silent night bore witness?

Was he mad? That thought had pierced the stricken heart of Paula like a dagger. She dared not question him more, as she saw anguish bring wrinkles to his face; and, too, he avoided her! He came no more, as had been his wont, to chat with her in the intervals of his work. Sometimes, however, she saw him, haggard and bare-headed, striding up and down the paths, wringing his hands, and ever and anon casting nervous glances towards the hothouse.

At last—and this was the last torment—one night, while she slept, he had come, with his noiseless tread, into her chamber. She had felt that he was there, and she had suddenly opened her eyes. Frederick, standing there motionless, glared at his hands contracted as in supplication.

"Frederick, Frederick! What are you doing here at this hour?"

He had muttered a brutal imprecation, and again had fled!

That is what Paula told me, and, as she spoke, I felt a reassuring sense of relief descend upon my heart. What was it, after all—a mere state of morbidness brought on by execessive work. I had been Frederick's pupil and friend for years, and I had often listened with wonder at the boldness of the hypotheses he launched into when warmed up on one of his favorite topics. Was I not a physician, and did I not recognize the madness of fever when I was brought face to face with it? So thinking, I reasoned with myself, and, sure of my eloquence and the power of reason, I went out into the park in search of Frederick.

Night had fallen, and the pathways were but dimly lighted by the stars. Presently I saw the hot-house of which Paula had spoken. It was large and well-built, surmounted with a Mauresque dome. The lights inside were not yet lit, but the stars glinted brightly on the curved glass panes.

So therein lay the mystery. I almost laughed aloud as I thought of Paula's childish fears.

As I stood taking in the details of the structure, a hurried step grated on the graveled path. Turning sharply about, I saw, or rather divined, in the deep shadow of the trees, Frederick Wertheim.

"Frederick," said I, boldly, "do you recognize me?"

He stopped abruptly.

"Frederick," I continued, "it is I," and I held out my hand, surprised not to feel his own.

Then guided, as it seemed to me, rather by the sound of my voice than by his eyes, he leaned forward, and, in a harsh, cracked voice, which sounded like the breaking of a branch, he said:

"You! What do you want? Leave me!"

"What! Is this the way you receive me after so long a separation? Have you forgotten our old friendship?"

He was undecided, wavering where he stood. I noticed, for the first time, that he carried on his arm a basket, which seemed to be quite heavy.

"I can not stop," he said; "let me pass."

"Why, certainly you can pass," I replied; "but you will not prevent me, I suppose, from following you. I want to have an old-time chat with you."

He chuckled in an uncanny fashion.

"You would follow me? Bah!"

"On my soul, professor, this glass palace must conceal some treasure of which you are very jealous."

With his free hand he seized my arm, and, as I kept silent, he leaned forward as one who listens. I seemed to make out some faint, singular sound, something like the gliding of a reptile through the grass.

"She is waiting for me!" he cried, in a tone in which I could detect an ill-suppressed terror; "I must go!"

"Well, if you must, let us go in together."

He seemed to hesitate still. Then with a determined gesture, he muttered: "Come, then; even you could defend me, if by any chance——"

He did not complete the sentence. But as his hand glided over mine, I felt that it was cold as ice.

He led me now. We arrived before the door of the hot-house. He drew a key from his pocket, and turned it in the lock; and, as I stepped forward, seeing nothing about me in the darkness, he drew me back with sudden violence.

"On your life," he whispered, "do not move!"

In spite of my assurance, I felt a vague, unreasoning dread seize upon me. Again I heard that strange rustling which had struck me before; it was a gentle, gliding sound, such as is made by a paper slipping across a marble floor.

All at once I knew not how, Frederick caused a glaring, blinding light to illuminate the hot-house, and—horrified, my hair rising upon my head, I fell back against the door, my hands clutching its iron bars!

In the centre of the room, in the midst of an endless variety of fantastically formed plants, a being, a nightmare, a horror arose before my eyes; a hydra, a polyp—a Thing no man could name.

It had the shape of a colossal court, and from its surface innumerable arms reached out, with glaucous-bulbs, like eyes, at the end of each. The inner body seemed green, the arms were of reddish purple, and, as they spread out to those ghoulish eyes, the blood-red seemed to blend and mingle to the greenness of a putrescent corpse.

My eyes closed involuntarily, and I felt a terrible griping at my heart; and still I head that gliding sound, which I divined came from those arms as they reached forth and contracted within themselves incessantly.

At last, surprised that I had not been seized by this hideous and monstrous thing, I mustered up strength to look at it. Frederick, who was now as pale as death, had taken from the basket a piece of meat, and, with infinite precautions, balancing gingerly on the tips of his toes, as if he feared lest his hand be touched by those horrible tentacles, he placed the raw morsel on the extremity of a cluster of those waving arms. And suddenly, as if they were of elastic, the arms drew in upon themselves, dragging the meat, which was thus brought to the shorter arms, which I now saw composed an inner circle. And all the arms bent in toward the centre, till I could no longer see the meat.

Shuddering and sick at heart, I glanced at Frederick. His forehead was covered with perspiration, his teeth chattered—the demoniac brute was motionless now, ravenous over its monstrous deglutition.

"She eats, Titane eats!" he whispered.

"Titane?" I repeated after him, stupidly.

"You do not know, you cannot understand! Do you not recognize her? Now, look, see, she is tamed——" and all at once I comprehended, I saw this monstrous beast.

For nearly an hour she will be this way," said Frederick; "ah, I know why you come! They think me mad! But it is not true—mad! I!—I, who by a miracle of perseverance, by a master-work of selection, have developed the insectivorous plant Drosera to this formidable size. You will see it, this monster, hold out its tentacles to me in an instant empty—and I must nourish it, I must feed it, or——" He glanced about him apprehensively,

"Or?" I repeated.

"Listen," said he; "you shall know my secret, You know with what ardor I followed the discoveries of Nitschke, Warming, and Darwin in the study of those strange plants that are intermediate between the vegetable and animal worlds, which entrap insects, seize them, and feed upon them, slowly absorbing and sucking norishment from them. I was sure of the results of these strange studies, I did not doubt the end for an instant, and I said to myself that the Drosera, the Dionœa, the Drosophyllum are—listen to me well, now—the degenerate posterity of monstrous animals, whose terrible forms have remained to us in the legends of the most primitive peoples. Hydras, chimeras, krakens, dragons—all have existed, the human imagination has created nothing. But by climatic adaptations, because of geological transplantation, and through the thousand-and-one modifying forces of nature, these formidable beings, deprived of the nourishment that was necessary to them, have retrogressed, by a kind of inverted atavism, into the vegetable form, have become immovable, attached to the soil by roots. They were compelled to seek their chief nourishment directly from the earth itself, and they have become plants again, preserving only the supreme aptitude, sole vestige of their lost life, the faculty of animal nutrition.

"I determined to reconstitute this atropic genus; I determined that I would change the plant back into the beast. Ah, how many attempts have failed! At length chance—all our science is but the child of chance—placed in my hands a Drosera of exceptional size. I have nourished her, and developed within her the remnants of the animal juices. Little by little she has evolved and grown, until, at last, the acme of deduction, the hydra, the dragon lives again! Behold my Titane—enormous and sublime! Behold her, ferocious in the hunger that I cannot sate!"

And as two tentacles separated themselves from the mass and waved softly in the air, with a hideous ceaseless motion, he gently laid upon them a fresh piece of flesh.

"But you do not know all," he continued, in a low tone; "if Titane should be very hungry—I did not foresee this—in her present condition of ferocious power, she would tear herself from the place to which her now enfeebled roots bind her! And then, a terrible and all-powerful brute, she would drag her slimy and enormous bulk out into the world where there are men, and women, and little children—and what has been my triumph would become my crime!

"I fear that she may escape some day, and, lest she become hungry, I watch her every hour, night and day. Were I once but a few minutes late, and I knew that she would hurl herself upon the world, menacing my wife and child, whom she would first encounter! Let her eat, let her eat, for she must not wish to move from here." And again he tossed down great masses of meat. And through the fibres of this horrible plant passed purple tides of the extracted blood.

At this moment, as I stood speechless, overwhelmed with the intensity of my revulsion, the barred door, which I had not securely shut, swung softly open, and Paula appeared.

Her courage had been stronger than her fear. Now that she knew I was there, she had had the boldness to violate the secrecy of this chamber of horrors.

"Frederick!" she cried.

But to her call a blood curdling shriek responded. In his surprise at her sudden appearance, Frederick had recoiled a step, and, forgetful of his danger, touched with his hand the monster's tentacles. With lightning rapidity all the hideous trumpet-mouths had seized upon the hand, grasping the wrist, the fore-arm! Oh, horror! I saw it drawn down by that resistless suction. I seized him about the body, straining every muscle to draw him from the embrace of the terrible Titane—but the brute was stronger than I.

Than my eyes fell upon an axe in the corner.

"The trunk! the trunk!" I cried to Paula; "cut it, hack it!"

Weak as she was with fright, she seized the axe and swung its shining blade and struck one blow that cut through the very roots of the plant. It seemed to make an effort to rise, to hurl itself at us, perhaps, and then, powerless, suddenly collapsed with a flaccid sound like wet linen, and at the same time I pulled the unfortunate Frederick loose from the relaxed tentacles.

Paula caught him in her arms. He opened his eyes, and, in a last spasm, fixed them on me as he said: "Assassin! you have killed Titane!"

And he fell back dead.—Translated for the Arogonaut from the French of Jules Lermina.

Frank James in the East.

"There goes Frank James. I wonder what he is going to do in New York?" The speaker and his companion halted and gazed at a man crossing Broadway at twenty-eight street, New York city.

There was nothing extraordinary about the individual who thus attracted attention. As a matter of fact he seemed a very commonplace personage. He was between five feet eight and five feet nine inches in height, attired in a badly fitting suit of dark coarse material. The sack coat and trousers were evidently the handiwork of some other tailor. On his head he wore a black slouch hat after the manner of the west. He was homely—a very long, bony nose, with a very decided inclination to a hook, was the prominent feature of a face scarcely indicating average intelligence. He carried his head in a drooping attitude, but beneath the rim of his broad brimmed hat peered forth two dark, small, but restless eyes. His hands were in his pockets.

"A poor man who might today be worth $100,000. In fact he is the last of the bandit kings. He is a man with a history—the retired and respectable train and bank robber."

It was indeed none other than the ex-outlaw of Missouri, a man upon whose head a price had been set by the governor of his state, who was thus parading so unconcernedly down Broadway one afternoon. A business trip to Connecticut had caused Frank James' appearance for two days in New York city and a short absence from his quiet little home at Independence, a village 14 miles east of Kansas City.

Frank James is, indeed, the last of the race of outlaws and bandits. The train robbers of the present day are mere tyros to this famous criminal, who, after 15 years of crime and after being hunted year in and year out for his life, lives quietly and peacefully in the bosom of his family in a Missouri village.

Frank James is a very reserved and almost taciturn. He never speaks of his robber exploits and nothing about him indicates the shrewdness and cool daring of the man. He has one weakness. He believes he can act. He is a great reader of Shakespeare and can quote page after page of the bard of Aron.

But he is a man of strong common sense and even conquers his pet failing of "spouting." He is a poor man; does not probably earn $30 a week. Yet he might to-day have been rich. After his trial responsible parties wanted to put him upon the stage in a drama written to order on his own career. He was offered $100,000 for a three year's contract, and finally $125,000 and all expenses. He refused. He said he wanted to withdraw from the public gaze; he wanted to end his days quietly with his family. He presisted, and now nothing distinguishes him from the ordinary western village storekeeper. He is about 45 years of age, and although not very robust has probably a long least of life.

A Groom of a Generous Turn.

From the New York Press.

Augustus Anderson, a steerage passenger who arrived on the French line steamship Normandie, became infatuated during the voyage from Havre with Ida Peterson. When they arrived at Castle Garden, Anderson applied to Superintendent Simpson for a German minister. The superintendent, after a short absence from the Garden, returned with Pastor Burgermeyer, who married the pair. As Mr. Simpson had taken so much trouble to bring about this union, Anderson told him that he might kiss the bride if he chose. The crowd who were in the vicinity after the marriage ceremony had been performed, thought the superintendent would not take the groom's offer, but he did just the same, giving Mrs. Anderson a kiss that resounded throughout the rotunda.

A Suspicious Traveling-Bag.

Not long ago a well-dressed traveller stopped at a prominent hotel over night, and before leaving gave the landlord his new nickel-mounted traveling-bag, requesting him to care of it until his return in a few days.

More than a week passed, but the traveler did not return, and the landlord thought proper to communicate the fact to the authorities who had of late issued strict regulations respecting the disposal of lost articles. On closer inspection the weight of the bag was discovered to be out of all proportion to its size, for the thing weighed no less than 58 pounds. This circumstance, together with the disappearance of the traveler, awakened grave suspicion, and after an active interchange of telegrams between cities, the bag was at first deposited in a cool place, and then carried by a couple of workmen, with every precaution, to a fort a couple of miles out of town. Here the suspicious article was consigned to a remote spot and no one allowed to approach it within a hundred paces. Various plans were now suggested to render the dangerous object harmless. Among other things it was proposed to drop the bag down from the edge of the cliff, thereby causing the bomb or the dynamite which it might contain to explode. This plan was, however, abandoned on the unexpected return of the traveler, who came to claim his bag from the landlord. He turned out to be a well-known commercial traveler for a hardware firm, and the cause of so much anxiety (the traveling-bag) contained neither dynamite nor shells, but only samples of tools weighing about 58 pounds. The owner was not a little surprised at the sensation that his bag had produced.

Condemned man—"Your Honor, I should think that a man in your position would avoid superfluity of language. "What do you mean?" "There is no necessity for the repetition of the word dead; in fact there is no necessity for the word at all, for it follows that if I am hanged by the neck death must ensue; therefore—" "Sheriff, remove the prisoner."—Lincoln Journal.

Moxie.

Catarrh

May affect any portion of the body where the mucous membrane is found. But catarrh of the head is by far the most common, and strange to say, the most liable to be neglected. It originates in a cold, or succession of colds, combined with impure blood. The wonderful success Hood's Sarsaparilla has had in curing catarrh warrants us in urging all who suffer with this disease to try the peculiar medicine. It renovates and invigorates the blood, and tones every organ.

"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for catarrh and it has done me a great deal of good. I recommend it to all within my reach." LUTHER D. ROBBINS, East Thompson, Ct.

Four Books Learned in One Reading.
A Year's Work Done in Ten Days.

Coll. Exon. Oxon., Sept. 1888.

Dear Sir:—In April, 1885, while thinking of taking orders in September, I suddenly received notice that my ordination examination would be held in a fortnight. I had only ten (10) days in which to prepare for the Exam. I should recommend a year's preparation in the case of anyone so utterly unprepared as I was; but your system had so strengthened my natural memory, that I was able to remember and give the gist of any book after reading it once. I therefore read Lightfoot, Proctor, Harold, Browne, Mosheim, &c., &c., once, and was successful in every one of the nine papers. The present Bishop of Edinburg knows the facts. Faithfully yours.

The largest cabbage farm in the world is near Chicago. It comprises 2,500 acres of land.

The Kansas Anti-Horsethief Association has recovered 98 per cent. of all the property ever stolen within its jurisdiction.

The alleged unhealthiness of keeping animals in yards where the manure accumulates is not substantiated by experience, provided that the yards are kept well filtered.—London Standard.

Honorable Pauper: My road has heard that you have been elected to the Legislature, and feeling that you would appreciate being cosidered a deadhead, I forward you this pass.—Western Rural.

A Western correspondent tells The Mirror that he never saw land where more benefit could be derived from judicious application of manure than the "rich" prairies of Illinois and Iowa.

In the opinion of the Kansas Horticultural Society, none of the Russian apples are worthy of cultivation except Oldenburg, Astrachan and Tetofski, all easily obtained at home nurseries, and "even these should only be planted sparingly for family use."

Mr. Harry Sedgwick, Cornwall Hollow, Conn., sold his apple crop in North Carolina, apropos of which The Connecticut Farmer remarks that "to a man who knows how to avail himself of the cheapest means of transportation, the Southern cities of the Atlantic Coast offer a hopeful field."

The harassed husbandman of Great Britain was urged by The London Agricultural Gazette to come in out of the rain of disaster with both raw material and finished goods. "Dutch barns for hay and straw, and covered yards for live stock and manure are examples."

The Board of Trade of Utica, N. Y., reports the one just ended as "the worst season ever known for cheese makers since the introduction of the factory system." The 5,755 boxes disposed of in that market in excess of last year's production brought $457,379 less money—or 19,247,760 pound an average of .07955 each, "the lowest rate on record." Little Falls sold in '85, 208,067 boxes for $990,007, against 526,196 in '84 for $1,407,392.

Shorter Paragraphs.

Mr. W. F. Clarke of The Rural Canadian, expresses the opinion that "of all dull scholars an old farmer, stiff-sot in his ways, is the hardest to convince." The good hope centres in the "rising" generation.

Mr. Harris Lewis's grapes having "froze down" last winter, including the hardy Concord, he will hereafter lay the vines on the ground in the fall and cover with hemlock brush for protection.

We know of a theological student in an Ohio college who, sustained by grace, rice and cornbread, lived thirteen weeks on $7; but there were several good apple orchards near the college, and the farmers kept no dogs.—American Miller.

Mr. G. W. Hoffman is confident that with a herd of thirty cows it would pay to have a man devote his entire time in winter to preparing food, currying, and looking out for their welfare in various ways.

Northern farmers are putting their stock into warm stables and sheds more than they used to, but they generally err in not protecting them better from the early frosts and the fall rains.—Kentucky Home and Farm.

A Long Island market gardener, writing of asparagus, says he prefers to plant one-year-old roots in April upon well manured soil, and begins to cut the second year. The best soil is a sandy loam. The cutting ends late in May with young plants, but is continued into July, when the stools are well established.

Mr. J. C. Wolfe tells The Western Rural that since adopting his present system with seed corn he has improved the quality of crop in respect to evenness and size of ears, and of uniformity in ripening and earliness of maturity: "My practice for years has been to save my seed corn when I am husking and pile it up like cordwood in the attic of my house, where no dampness or mice can get to it. I have a box that will hold about a bushel, with a pair of springseat hooks on it so that I can hook it on the outside of the wagonbox and when I come across a choice ear I throw it into the box. In this way I get about a bushel of the most choice ears while I am husking a load of twenty-five bushels."

A Clean Pig-Pen.

A great change is taking place among western stockmen and journals in regard to the benefit of pure water and clean food for swine as a precaution against swine fever. A few years ago it was thought, or at least said, that hogs were not subject to the same conditions as other animals; that filth was natural to them, and therefore cleanliness was thrown away upon them. If any one could see, as the writer has done recently, the lair of some hogs which were ranged in a southern forest he would wholly change his views if he ever held such as these. A nest of brakes and leaves carried in under a shelving rock, which formed a protecting roof, afforded a soft, clean bed. Not an odor of the common pig pen could be detected, and a clear, sparkling brook ran near by to which a distinct trail had been worn by the animals. The modern western idea, however, is that hogs need pure water and wholesome and varied food to maintain them in health, and this lesson has been learned through the influence of that potent and effective teacher—the pocket.—N. Y. Times.

Down With Skim Milk Cheese.

Some years ago it was discovered that passable cheese could be made where one-half the milk was skimmed and the cream made into butter. Since, then the cheating in cheese has constantly increased. One result is that butter is too low to afford any profit, and much of the cheese is almost unsalable at any figure. Some of the cheese now made is from milk, out of which every particle of butter has been taken by putting it in creameries surrounded by ice. Of course there is no demand for such cheese as this, and the fact that it is on the market seriously limits the sale of the best. With honestly made cheese, says the Boston Cultivator, there should be a foreign demand that always make its production profitable. What is true of cheese is true also of nearly everything else that the farmer produces. There is profit only in the best.

Feeding of Young Calves

New York Times.

The feeding of young calves is now a timely subject for consideration. Full feeding up to the point of perfect digestion and assimilation should be the aim. It is easy to discover when this point is reached. The condition of the bowel discharge is an accurate test. As soon as the dung has an offensive odor digestion is impaired, and either the food is given to excess or the character of it is not healthful. As a rule sour food is not wholesome for calves. If one goes to the cattle markets and visits the calf pens, the "buttermilk calves" are readily found by their filthy odor. The calves may be plump and appear all right, but the contrary will soon appear when a purchaser gets them home. The fasting will soon affect injuriously the soft, flaccid, unhealthy flesh, and the calves will fail in a serious manner, and time and food will be wasted in bringing them into condition again. This experience should warn the owners of calves to study carefully the feeding, and to use only the best of food. It is easy to have sweet milk for the calves, and it will pay to warm this to 90 deg. At this time calves are sufficiently advanced to take a considerable ration of meal, but the full feeding of this should be cautiously reached by gradual increase of the ration from a small and safe quantity. The moment diarrhea occurs feeding should stop for 48 hours, and then small doses of hot sweet milk only should be given.

The Gift of Being Well-Born—Who Bestow it on Their Children.

Hattie T. Griswold in Chicago Tribune.

There is nothing truer than that real gentleness of breeding—finest manners—requires that one should have been well-born. In this, as in most other things, Emerson's doctrine holds good, and when one is born the gate of gifts is closed upon him. I am far from meaning by this that one must have been born to wealth or fashion, or to be able to boast of fine ancestors. All these things are good and are elements not to be despised, but none of these are essential to gentle birth. What is essential is, that one's parents must have been people of fine grain, poor or rich; that they must have had real delicacy of nature, real refinement of life, real appreciation of the elements of fine character. No vulgar rich woman, storming at and ill-treating her servants, browbeating tradesmen, boasting of her possessions, flaunting her diamonds in the street or railroad car, trailing costly dinner dresses in the streets, ashamed of her poor but respectable relations, and unable anywhere to find anything quite good enough for her—no woman of this description, I say, can bestow this gift of gentle birth upon her children. There will be somewhere a drop of black blood in their veins.

No coarse, sensual father, vulgar in every attribute, unclean in every thought, polluting himself with tobacco and beer, and indulging in vices, can bestow this priceless boon upon their children. For it comes and comes only to clean lives, of high purpose, and of lifelong culture. It is an evolution, and not a creation. The men and the women in however humble a station who have delicate tastes, high aspirations, and pure morals, may be the germs from which shall be evolved in due time the finest flowers of our civilization. In homes of real refinement and true cultivation it is not necessary to teach children much about manners. They imbibe good manners with their mothers' milk; they absorb good manners from the daily atmosphere, they acquire them as unconsciously as they acquire a language. Some instruction will, of course, be necessary upon points of etiquette, but this will not be hard for children to acquire who have lived in an atmosphere of politeness and gentle breeding.

Oysters Fried to the Queen's Taste.

Harper's Bazar.—Small ones are just as toothsome for grilling, but large, plump specimens present a better appearance. Keep if possible, a soap-stone griddle expressly for cooking them, and let it heat slowly on the back of the range at least an hour before needed. The oysters can not be drained too long nor too well, for one of the secrets of success is to have them perfectly dry. Ten hours is not too long to let them stand in the colander; first place them under a stream of water for three or four minutes to wash off all impurities, wipe lightly afterward with a thin cloth, and placing in the ice-chest until wanted; but if desired unexpectedly sop between towels, lightly patting out the moisture until dry. When ready to cook them move the griddle to a hot part of the stove, and grease it very slightly with fresh butter; lay on the oysters close together, but not crowding, and as fast as browned, nicely turn them with a spoon, not using a fork, for the piercing lets out the liquor. When done, serve in a very hot dish with a trifle of melted butter. If a griddle can not be procured, a skillet or frying pan will answer, and they can either be well shaken all the time or turned with a spoon.

Saved By Common Sense.

Two children, of five and seven years respectively, were among many taken down with scarlet fever of a malignant type, epidemic in the village. Four or five others on the same block died; they survived, having received simply hygienic treatment, described as follows:

"They were in connecting rooms and a window constantly kept open in each so as to have a free circulation of air, though it was midwinter." The fire was kept burning a little more brightly in order that the room might be kept comfortable with the windows thus opened. For the first four or five days they wanted no food and none was given them. Their bedding was changed every day. Clothes wet with ice water were kept around their throats day and night during the inflammatory stages, changed every fifteen minutes. They were given pounded ice to eat or slowly melt in the mouth as much as they wanted. When the fever was high, it was promptly reduced by cool packs and sponge baths. The room was frequently fumigated. When they became convalescent and began to eat, they were given brown bread, fruits, etc., no animal food or milk. As soon as they were able to walk a little they were wrapped up and taken on a long piazza to take the air, at least twice a day, and kept out longer each day. Their recovery was rapid, though they had been terribly sick. They took not an atom of any kind of medicine."

The father, who communicated the above particulars through The Orange County Farmer, is confident that had his children been treated the same as others they to would in all probability have joined the throng of victims of the mistaken idea that drugging is a benefit.

Sleeplessness—An Unfailing Remedy for Little Children.

From Babyhood.

I have found an unfailing remedy for sleeplessness in my children is fresh air, either taking them to it or introducing an abundant supply into their rooms. Taking them to it is the surest way.

My nurse, when baby was two weeks old, was bewildered by so healthy a creature never sleeping in the day time, and used every means in her knowledge to cause sleep, but without success. At last I insisted that my recipe should be tried. She should take him in the garden. So she bundled him up and then went for a handkerchief to cover his face. I objected—that would not do. She could protect his face with a sunshade, but he must have air. So out he went, with his great blue eyes wide open to look at the world. Hardly had she crossed the threshold when the eyes were closed, and he had the sweetest and most peaceful nap he ever enjoyed in his life.

This experience seemed to convince him that out of doors was the only sleeping place, and from May to November he never took a nap in the house, but slept peacefully in his carriage in the garden or on the piazza. Under this system he grew and thrived wonderfully.

The baby of a friend of mine in Central Massachusetts took naps out of doors all winter, properly protected in his carriage on a sheltered piazza, and, though a very delicate child, never once took cold.

I think one cause of sleeplessness in nursing babies is that their mothers take too little refreshing exercise in the open air. If I failed to be in the fresh air some time each day when I was nursing a baby I always could see the result in the increased fretfulness and nervousness of the child. A pleasant walk, or, if too tiresome, sitting out-of-doors for even fifteen minutes, always seemed to impart to the milk a quieting, healthful quality. My children have all been of sensitive organizations, and for that reason I have been led to notice these things. I hope my experience may be of use to some other mothers.

Bewilderingly Pretty Stockings.

From the New York Tribune.

Stockings are very gay. The gold embroidered and beaded roses and lilies of the present new styles have tiny drooping tassels of silk and fine beads; in others the artistic mingling of colors has never been surpassed in harmonious blendings of pale olive, brown and blue; brown and wine color, flesh color and a warm olive, and dark red and olive. Pretty stripes are seen in moss-green and rose-pink, black and red, blue and cardinal. Vertical stripes of brilliant colors are divided by a narrow stripe of lace. Another still daintier style has feet of rose-color and moss-green tops, and other feet of delicate colors with artistic contrasts. The finest silk stockings of plain black have fine ecru silk soles, and black lace stockings are exquisite enough for gloves. Black spun-silk stockings are finished with unbleached soles, and handsome fine walking styles have balbriggan feet and black silk tops. Sober gray is a favorite shade, as a strong contrast to the butterfly brightness of the others, and cafe au lait where there is more milk than there is coffee, sage, peacock blue, strawberry red, and all shades of blue, make up the rest.

How to Make Good Coffee.

Cor. New York Times.

Buy the best coffee and grind it to the consistency of ordinary cornmeal. Into a French teapot put an ounce of coffee for every person. One pound of coffee will make 16 cups, and no more. Have everything clean, and as soon as the water in the teakettle begins to boil moisten the coffee gently, and leave it to soak and swell for three minutes; then add a little more water; don't be in a hurry; continue to add water until you have obtained not more than a large coffee cupful of the extract. If carefully done the entire virtue of the coffee will be in the cupful of liquor at the end of five minutes. For four persons use a quart of pure milk and have it piping hot; heat the large cups by pouring into them hot water; now divide the coffee into the four cups, each of which will be one-quarter full; fill with the boiling milk. This is pure breakfast coffee, the coffee of the gods, of which no man after drinking would be so base as to call for a second cup. He that drinketh it this morning will be unhappy if he fails to get it to-morrow morning. But these instructions must be followed to the letter.

Among many mottoes adorning the walls of the audience room on the occasion of the recent nineteenth annual session, in Boston, of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, were these: "The earth is full of his mercies;" "Reap for the mind as well as for the body," and this from President Jefferson; "They who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God."

In Germany apothecaries are not allowed to sell miscellaneous articles, on the ground that such sales are likely to divert the clerk's attention from the delicate duty of compounding medicines. There are drug stores where miscellaneous articles are for sale, but no prescriptions can be prepared in them, under severe penalties. Poisonous articles are kept in a room reserved exclusively for them.

MARGARET'S MISTAKE.

A young girl was leaning against the trunk of an elm tree, gazing at the sunset glory. A charming picture she made, the deepening gold of the sunshine glinting down on the purple-black hair and lending new softness to the Oriental features. Nor were these charms lost on Charles Raymond, who, with pencil and sketch-book lying idly before him, was looking at her through the network of foliage which hid him from her view.

A handsome young fellow was this Charles Raymond, impulsive and headstrong, but withal a kindly and generous heart.

He had drifted into this rural village with two companions early in June for a few weeks of hunting and fishing. After a fortnight his two companions started on a tour to the lakes and Charley refused to accompany them. Gossiping neighbors whispered that pretty Margaret was the attraction which held him there, and indeed such was the case. Her beauty had interested him at first, then the petty abuse of her stern mistress had aroused his pity, and finally he learned to love the friendless orphan.

Margaret turned to go home when a rustling in the branches and a voice calling her name arrested her steps.

"You looked like a wood-nymph, Margaret," said Raymond as he approached her side, "and I hesitated to disturb you. But come, let us sit on this mossy stone," and he drew the girl to his side. "I am going home in a few days," he continued, "and I want to talk to you before I go."

"The few weeks that I have passed here have been very pleasant to me, the happiest of my life, for in them I have met and loved you, Margaret, my Margaret."

He bent over and impressed on the full, ripe lips the first love-kiss they had ever known. A scarlet tide of color swept over her face as she wrested herself from his embrace.

"Oh, no! no!" she sobbed, "you must not talk that way. I am poor, uneducated—in every way unworthy of you."

"Say no more, Margaret; your position in life is your misfortune, not your fault. I have often wished to learn the history of your childhood; you surely remember something of your adoption by Miss Leman."

"Very little. There are faint recollections of a long sea voyage, of a dark eyed, soft voiced woman; a gentleman tall and grand—my parents I think. Then the lady sickened, and one day the man held me in his arms to look at her still white face. Beyond this I know nothing except what I have learned from Miss Leman. A stranger with a strong foreign accent stopped at the Corners Inn nearly thirteen years ago. He was richly dressed, and the child who was supposed to be his daughter, wore clothing of the finest material. He died during the night, and the child—myself—was committed to the care of the parish overseer, and was soon adopted by Hannah Leman."

"Have you nothing as a clue to the past?"

"Nothing, save a queer little casket containing two miniature likenesses and a little bracelet, on which is engraved my name, Marguerite Dupree."

Here the spinster's shrill voice crying "Margaret" was heard, and the girl bounded away to the house.

On the following morning young Raymond joined a party of youths who were going out hunting. Three hours had scarcely elapsed when a country youth who was one of the party appeared at the door of the kitchen and stammered out:

"A dretful accident has happened, Miss Leman. The young gentleman, Mr. Raymond, has shot hisself, somehow, and I cum on to prepare ye."

His companions now appeared, bearing the limp form of the young man. A wild shriek broke from Margaret's lips as she saw his white face, and bending over him she cried:

"He is dead! dead! My darling is dead! Oh, Charley, Charley! And I loved you so—I loved you so!"

"Be silent! Have you no shame, girl?" the spinster hissed, as she drew the girl roughly aside.

Restoratives were applied, and a faint quiver passing over the body showed that life still remained.

After he was undressed and put to bed the doctor seemed to think that the patient would recover.

In folding up his clothes the spinster's sharp eye discovered a locket which had fallen upon the floor, and opening it, discovered that it contained the picture of a girl, beautiful as an houri, a delicate aristocratic face, whose possessor must belong to a high station in life.

A sarcastic smile was on her lips as she placed the locket in Margaret's hand and watched the girl grow white as she gazed on the portrait.

"Now, what do you think of your London beau? Very pretty stories he has told you, no doubt, and his talk has turned your silly head. Very strange that he wore her picture next to his breast, though."

Margaret made no response. Her temper was quick and impulsive, and her blazing eyes and compressed lips showed that deep feeling was aroused. A resolve that she had long cherished was strengthened. She would leave the house, with all its hateful surroundings.

Accordingly at 12 o'clock she slipped noiselessly down the stairs and out of the house. An hour later a train was bearing her swiftly from Westbrook.

* * * * * * * *

It was the night of the annual entertainment with which Mrs. Desmond was wont to favor her pupils after the exercises of breaking-up day. As these entertainments were widely known, the drawing-rooms were well filled at an early hour.

"Do you see that beautiful girl yonder, Raymond, with such glorious eyes and hair? She once worked in a factory, but the wife of the proprietor took an interest in her and placed her in this school."

The cry of surprise on Raymond's lips was arrested by the exclamation of a lady who stood near—Mme Leroy, a wealthy French widow.

"Mon Dieu! I have seen that face before. Can it be——"

Then rushing up to Raymond's companion she grasped his hand and said:

"Oh, Mr. Walton! do you know her? Can you favor me with an introduction?"

Raymond saw them walk away, and soon after Mme. Leroy was conversing earnestly with the young girl.

Half an hour later she came to him, leading her new found acquaintance.

"Allow me to present my niece, Mr. Raymond, Marguerite Dupree. She is the daughter of my only sister, who died on shipboard while returning from India. My brother-law disappeared after her death, and we have never been able to ascertain what fate had befallen him. The features of my niece are singularly like her mother's, and her own statement, together with the portraits, have convinced me of the relationship."

Soon after the aunt moved away with her charge, and Raymond was unable to speak to her until late in the evening, when he saw her standing alone by the window.

"Margaret," he said, softly, going to her side, "you surely have not forgotten me?"

"No, Mr. Raymond, I have not," she replied, coldly. "Do you suppose I have forgotten your base treachery?"

"Treachery, Margaret! What do you mean?"

She smiled scornfully. "If I had not gazed upon the picture of your betrothed I might now be a victim to your deceit."

It was now Raymond's time to smile.

"I have the picture to which you refer in my posession still. It is the likeness of my mother, who died in my infancy."

The carnation bloom widened in the girl's cheek then, and her eyes fell for the first time during the interview. She did not even withdraw her hand from that which sought her's then, and listened while Charles Raymond breathed again the love words he had spoken years ago in the sunlight by the river in Westbrook.

One month later Margaret Dupree stood at the altar with Charles Raymond, the man who had loved her in the days of her poverty, and whose love she had failed to banish from her heart in all the years that intervened.—New York World.

Earthquakes and Animals.

From the American Magazine.

In the last issue of the transactions of the Seismological Society of Japan, Prof. Milne discusses the effects of earthquakes on animals. The records of most great earthquakes refer to the consternation of dogs, horses, cattle and other domestic animals. Fish also are frequently affected. In the London earthquake of 1749 roach and other fish in a canal showed evident signs of confusion and fright, and sometimes after an earthquake fish rise to the surface dead and dying. During the Tokio earthquake of 1880 cats inside a house ran about trying to escape, foxes barked and horses tried to kick down the boards confining them to their stables. There can, therefore, be no doubt that animals know something unusual and terrifying is taking place. More interesting than these are the observations showing that animals are agitated just before an earthquake. Ponies have been known to prance about their stalls, pheasants to scream and frogs to cease croaking suddenly a little time before a shock, as if aware of its coming. The Japanese say that moles show their agitation by burrowing. Geese, pigs, and dogs appear more sensitive in this respect than other animals. After the great Calabrian earthquake it is said that the neighing of a horse, the braying of an ass, or the cackle of a goose was sufficient to cause the inhabitants to fly from their houses in expectation of a shock. Many birds are said to show their uneasiness before an earthquake by hiding their heads under their wings and behaving in an unusual manner. At the time of the Calabrian shock little fish like sand eels (Cirricelli), which are usually buried in the sand, came to the top and were caught in multitudes. In South America certain quadrupeds, such as dogs, cats, and jerboas, are believed by the people to give warning of coming danger by their restlessness; sometimes immense flocks of sea birds fly inland before an earthquake, as if alarmed by the commencement of some suboceanic disturbance. Before the shock of 1825 in Chili all the dogs are said to have escaped from the city of Talcahuano. The explanation offered by Prof. Milne of this apparent prescience is that some animals are sensitive to the small tremors which precede nearly all earthquakes. He has himself felt them some seconds before the actual earthquake came. The alarm of intelligent animals would then be the result of their own experience, which has taught them that small tremors are premonitory of movements more alarming. Signs of alarm days before an earthquake are probably accidental, but sometimes in volcanic districts gases have emanated from the ground prior to earthquakes, and have poisoned animals. In one case large numbers of fish were killed in this way in the Tiber, and at Follonica, on the morning of April 6, 1874, "the streets and roads were covered with dead rats and mice. In fact, it seemed as if it had rained rats. The only explanation of the phenomenon was that these animals had been destroyed by emanations of carbon dioxide."

Where Log Cabins Flourish.

A party of American gentlemen, who had been camping out on an island in the great Lake Nipissing, Canada, last summer, were returning in a sail-boat and were yet seven miles from port when the sun went down, and with it the sailing breeze.

A discouraging situation, truly.

"Never mind, I can row you there inside of two hours," said the guide who had charge of the party, as their murmurs arose.

"Why, man, it is seven miles, there are four of us in this heavy boat—its a big job you undertake," said one.

"No matter, I have done the likes before and can do it again," cheerfully replied the broad-shouldered Irishman, as he stowed away the sail and bent to the oars. He was a splendid oarsman and the boat was soon under headway again.

"What would I not give to enjoy your health and strength," remarked the Professor.

"Yes, I am pretty healthy, and though I am past sixty I feel as strong as ever," replied the guide. "But only three years ago I stood at death's door, and never thought to pull an oar again. You see, I was in the woods all winter, logging, and I got into water one day and caught cold. It settled on my lungs and I had a bad cough which hung on till I ran down almost to a skeleton."

"Call in a physician?"

"Yes, I went twenty miles through the bush to see a doctor; he gave me some medicine, but it didn't help me much."

"How was the cure effected?"

"An old Scotch lady, who had come over from the States, gave me a preparation of balsams and herbs, which she said the early settlers in America used, and it soon stopped my cough and put me on my feet again."

One has but to travel along the frontier to learn how easy it is to get along without doctors, and how effective are the natural remedies which the old grandmothers know how to prepare. They often cure where the best physicians fail.

Every mother of a family knows how coughs and colds are quickly and radically cured with syrups and teas made from balsams and herbs which "grandmother taught us how to make."

Warner's Log Cabin cough and consumption remedy was, after long investigation into the merits and comparison with other old time preparations, selected from them because proved to be the very best of them all. It has brought back the roses to many a pallid cheek—there is no known remedy its equal as a cure for coughs and colds.

A Muskrat on His Mettle.

Forest and Stream.

A number of years ago, while I was hunting muskrats in a marsh on Long Island Sound, there being several feet of snow on the ground, I chanced to get myself in between one of these animals and his burrow, which happened to be the only means, beyond his running away from me; that presented itself for his escape. He took in the situation at a glance, and I was curious to see what he would do about it. Imagine my surprise when he started to come down for me as fast as his legs would carry him, and in a few moments he was too close for me to shoot without tearing his beautiful pelt all to shreds, for I at once saw that he was an unusually handsome specimen, and to thus spoil him would be a great shame. When within about a yard of me, and his eyes flashing out their meaning at his thus, being cornered, he, without a moment's hesitation, made a spring at me and landed on the top of one of my leather shooting boots, a pair that came above my knees; in an instant he commenced tearing away with his teeth at a great rate, but before he had bitten anything but my boot I grabbed him at the back of the neck, and between throttling him and bumping his head against the heel of my gun, he was rendered lifeless. This formed the only case of a muskrat attacking a man that has ever come to me, and in this particular instance I admired the little brute's bravery all the more after I found that he possessed but three legs, one of them having long since been amputated high up, probably in a steel trap, but the stump was perfect, and he had the blackest hair of any muskrat I ever saw.

HAVE MORE LIGHT.

What Dr. Talmage Has to Say About Melancholy Music, Pecksniffing Ministers and Canting Hypocrites.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 21—This morning at the Tabernacle the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., gave a running commentary on the 20th chapter of Revelation concerning the chaining of the Old Dragon. The congregation joined in singing the familiar hymn of Paul Gerhart, beginning:

"Give to the wind thy fears,
Hope and be undismayed."

Dr. Talmage's sermon was on "Seven in the Bible," and his text, Genesis, ch. 2, v. 22: "God Blessed the Seventh Day." The preacher said:

The mathematics of the Bible is noticeable; the geometry and the arithmetic; the square Ezekiel; the circle spoken of in Isaiah; the curve alluded to in Job; the rule of fractions mentioned in Daniel; the rule of loss and gain in Mark where Christ asks the people to cipher out by that rule what it would "profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul." But there is one mathematical figure that is crowned above all others in the Bible. It is the numeral seven, which the Arabians got from India and all following ages have taken from the Arabians. It stands between the figure six and the figure eight. In the Bible all the other numerals bow to it. Over 300 times is it mentioned in the Scriptures, either alone or compounded with other words. In Genesis the week is rounded into seven days, and I use my text because there this numerical is for the first introduced in a journey which halts not until in the close of the Book of Revelation its monument is built into the wall of heaven in crysolite which in the strata of precious stones is the seventh. In the Bible we find that Jacob had to serve seven years to get Rachel, but she was worth it; and foretelling the years of prosperity and famine in Pharaoh's time the seven fat oxen were eaten up of the seven lean oxen; and wisdom is said to be built on seven pillars; and the ark was left with the Philistines seven years; and Naaman for the cure of his leprosy plunged in the Jordan seven times; the dead child, when Elisha breathed into his mouth, signalled its arrival back into consciousness by sneezing seven times; to the house that Ezekiel saw in his vision there were seven steps; the walls of Jericho before they fell down were compassed seven days; Zachariah describes a stone with seven eyes; to cleanse a leprous house the door must be sprinkled with pigeon's blood seven times; in Canaan were overthrown seven nations; on one occasion Christ cast out seven devils; on a mountain he fed a multitude of people with seven loaves, the fragments left filling seven baskets; and the closing passages of the Bible are magnificent and overwhelming with the imagery made up of seven churches, seven stars, seven candlesticks, seven seals, seven angels, and seven heads, and seven crowns, and seven horns, and seven spirits, and seven vials, and seven plagues, and seven thunders.

Yea, this numeral seven seems a favorite with the Divine mind, outside as well as inside the Bible, for are there not seven prismatic colors? And when God with the rainbow would never have another deluge, he wrote it on the scroll of the sky in ink of seven colors. He grouped into the Pleiades seven stars. Rome, the capital of the world, sat on seven hills. When God would make the most intelligent thing on earth, the human countenance, he fashions it with seven features—the two ears, the two eyes, the two nostrils and the mouth. Yea, our body lasts only seven years, and we gradually shed it for another body after another seven years, and so on, for we are, as to our bodies, septennial animals. So the numeral seven ranges through nature and through revelation. It is the number of perfection, and so I use it while I speak of the seven candlesticks, the seven stars, the seven seals and the seven thunders,

The seven golden candlesticks were and are the churches. Mark you, the churches never can be, candles. They are only candlesticks. They are not the light. A room in the night might have in it five hundred candlesticks, and yet you could not see your hand before your face. The only use of a candlestick, and the only use of a church, is to hold up the light. You see it is a dark world, the night of sin, the night of trouble, the night of superstition, the night of prosecution, the night of poverty, the night of sickness, the night of death, aye about 50 nights have interlocked their shadows. The whole race goes stumbling over prostrated hopes fallen fortunes, and empty flour barrels, and desolated cradles, and death beds. Oh, how much we have use for all the seven candlesticks, with lights blazing from the top of each one of them! The light of Pardon for all sin! Light of comfort for all trouble! Light of encouragement for all despondency! Light of eternal riches for all poverty! Light of rescue for all persecution! Light of reunion for all the bereft! Light of heaven for all the dying! And this light is Christ, who is the Light that shall yet irradiate the hemispheres. But, mark you, when I say churches are not candles, but candlesticks, I cast no slur on candlesticks. I believe in beautiful candlesticks. The candlesticks that God ordered for the ancient tabernacle were something exquisite. They were a dream of beauty carved out of loveliness. They were made of hammered gold, stood in a foot of gold and had six branches of gold blooming all along in six lilies of gold each, and lips of gold from which the candles lifted their holy fire. And the best houses in any city ought to be the churches—the best built, the best ventilated, the best swept, the best windowed and the best chandeliered. Log cabins may do in neighborhoods where most of the people live in log cabins; but there be palatial churches for regions where many of the people live in palaces. Do not have a better place for yourself than for your Lord and King. Do you live in a parlor and put your Christ in a kitchen These seven candlesticks of which I speak were not made out of pewter or iron; they were golden candlesticks, and gold is not only a valuable but bright metal. Have everything about your church bright—your ushers with smiling faces, your music jubilant, your hand-shaking cordial, your entire service attractive.

Many people feel that in church they must look dull in order to be reverential, and many whose faces in other kinds of assemblage show all the different phases of emotion, have in church no more expression than the back wheel of a hearse. Brighten up and be responsive. If you feel like weeping, weep. If you feel like smiling, smile. If you feel indignant at some wrong assailed from the pulpit, frown. Do not leave your naturalness and resiliency home because it is Sunday morning. If, as officers of a church, you meet people at the church door with a black look, and have the music black, and the minister in black preach a black sermon, and from invocation to benediction have the impression black, few will come, and those who do come will wish they had not come at all.

Golden candlestick! Scour up the six lilies on each branch and know that the more lovely and bright they are, the more fit they are to hold the light. But a Christless church is a damage to the world rather than a good. Cromwell stabled his cavalry horses in St. Paul's Cathedral, and many now use the church as a place in which to stable their vanities and worldliness. A worldly church is a candlestick without the candle, and it had its prototype in St. Sophia, in Constantinople, built to the glory of God by Constantine, but transformed to base uses by Mohammed the Second. Built out of colored marble; a cupalo with 25 windows soaring to the height of 180 feet; the ceiling one great bewilderment of mosaic; galleries supported by eight columns of porphyry and 67 columns of green jasper; nine bronze doors with alto relievo work fascinating to the eye of any artist, vases and vestments encrusted with all manner of precious stones. Four walls on fire with indescribable splendor. Though labor was cheap the building cost $1,500,000. Ecclesiastical structure almost supernatural in pomp and majesty. But Mohammedanism tore down from the walls of that building all the saintly and Christly images, and high up in the dome the figure of the cross was rubbed out that the crescent of the barbarous Turk might be substituted. A great church but no Christ! A gorgeous candlestick but no candle! Ten thousand such churches would not give the world as much light as one home-made tallow candle by which last night some grandmother in the eighties put on her spectacles and read the Psalms of David in large type. Up with the churches, by all means! Hundreds of them, thousands of them, and the more the better. But let each one be a blaze of heavenly light making the world brighter and brighter till the last shadow has disappeared, and the last of the suffering children of God shall have reached the land where they have no need of candlestick or "of candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light and they shall reign forever and ever."

Turn now in your Bible to the seven stars. We are distinctly told that they are the ministers of religion. Some of them are large stars, some of them small stars, some of them sweep a wide circuit and some of them a small circuit, but so far as they are genuine they get their light from the central sun around whom they make revolution. Let each one keep his own sphere. The solar system would soon be wrecked if the stars, instead of keeping their own orbit, should go to hunting down other stars. Ministers of religion should never clash. But in all the centuries of the Christian church some of these stars have been hunting an Edward Irving or a Horace Bushnell or an Albert Barnes; and the stars that were in pursuit of the other stars lost their own orbit, and some of them could never again find it. Alas! for the heresy hunters! The best way to destroy error is to preach the truth. The best way to scatter darkness is to strike a light. There is in immensity room enough for all the stars, and in the church room enough for all the ministers. The ministers who give up righteousness and the truth will get punishment enough, for they are "the wandering stars for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." But I should like as a minister when I am dying to be able truthfully to say what a captain of the English army fallen at the head of his column and dying on the Egyptian battlefield said to Gen. Wolesley, who came to condole with him: "I led them straight; didn't I lead them straight, general?" God has put us ministers as captains in this battlefield of truth against error. Great at last will be our chagrin if we fail leading the people the wrong way; but great will be our gladness if when the battle is over we can hand our sword back to our great Commander, saying: "Lord Jesus! We led the people straight, didn't we lead them straight?" Those ministers who go off at a tangent and preach some other gospels are not stars but comets, and they flash across the heavens a little while and make people stare, and throw down a few meteoric stones, and then go out of sight if not out of existence. Oh, brethren in the ministry, let us remember that God calls us stars, and our business is to shine and to keep our own sphere, and then when we get done trying to light up the darkness of this world we will wheel into higher spheres, and in us shall be fulfilled the promise, "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

Ah! the ministers are not all Pecksniffs and canting hypocrites, as some would have you think! Forgive me if, having in your presence at other times glorified the medical profession and the legal profession and the literary profession—I glorify my own I have seen them in their homes and heard them in their pulpits, and a grander array of men never breathed, and the Bible figure is not strained when it calls them stars; and whole constellations of glorious ministers have already taken their places on high where they shine even brighter than they shone on earth; Edward N. Kirk, of the Congregational church, Stephen H. Tyng, of the Episcopal church; Matthew Simpson, of the Methodist church; John Dowling, of the Baptist church; Samuel K. Talmage, of the Presbyterian church; Dr. DeWitt, of the Reformed church; John chambers, of the Independent church, and there I stop, for it so happens that I have mentioned the seven stars of the seven churches,

I pass on to another mighty Bible seven, and they are the seven seals. St. John in a vision saw a scroll with seven seals, and he heard an angel cry: "Who is worthy to loose the seals thereof?"

Take eight or ten sheets of foolscap paper, paste them together and roll them into a scroll, and have the scroll at seven different places sealed with sealing wax. You unroll the scroll till you come to one of these seals, and then you can go no further until you break that seal; then you go on until all the seven seals are broken, and the contents of the entire scroll is revealed. Now that scroll with seven seals held by the angel was the prophecy of what was to come on the earth; it meant that the knowledge of the future was with God, and no man and no angel was worthy to open it; but the Bible says Christ opened it and broke all the seven seals. He broke the first seal and unrolled the scroll, and there was a painting of a white horse, and that meant prosperity and triumph for the Roman empire, and so it really came to pass that for 90 years virtuous Emperors succeeded each other, Nerva, Trajan and Antoninus. Christ in a vision broke the second seal and unrolled again and there was a painting of a red horse, and that meant bloodshed, and so it really came to pass, and the next 90 years were red with assassination and wars. Then Christ broke the third seal and unrolled it, and there was a painting of a black horse, which in all literature means famine, oppression and taxation; and so it really came to pass. Christ went on until he broke all the seven seals and opened all the scroll. Well, the future of all of us is a sealed scroll, and I am glad that no one but Christ can open it. Do not let us join that class of Christians in our day who are trying to break the seven seals of the future. They are trying to peep into things they have no business with. They try to fortell what is going to come to them and what is going to come on the earth. They know nothing about it.

Christ is the only one who can break the seal of the future. Bible prophecy was not written to help us to tell things in the future, but to have us, when the things actually do come to pass, compare them with prophecy, and so learn God's fore-knowledge, and the inspiration of the Scriptures. But you go into the study of the prophecies in order to find out what is going to happen a year from now or 20 years from now, or 1,000 years from now, and I will make a prophecy of my own and that is that you will have your brain addled, if you do not positively get into a public or private insane asylum, where the greatest of expounders and preachers of prophecy ended his life a few years since, and where you may regale the visitors of the institution with incoherent mumblings over something from Revelations about the leopard that means Greece, and the bear which means Medo-Persia and the image with the great toes. What a mental wreck did the persistent attempt to forestall events make of that miracle of preachers, Edward Irving of London. It would take several mad-houses to hold the demented victims of the improper use of the prophecies of Daniel and Revelations. What! are not those books to be studied? Yes. No part of the Bible is more important. Neither is there any more important shelf in that apothecary's store than the shelf on which are the belladonna and the morphine, but be more careful in using them than in the use of peppermint and ginger. Keep your hands off of the seven seals. Christ will break them soon enough. Don't go to some necromancer or spiritualist or soothsayer fortune-teller to find out what is going to happen to yourself, or your family, or your friends.

Wait till Christ breaks the seal to find out whether in your own personal life or the life of the nation or the life of the world it is going to be the white horse prosperity or the red horse of war or the black horse of famine. You will soon enough see him paw and hear him neigh. Take care of the present and the future will take care of itself. If a man live 70 years his biography is on a scroll having at least seven seals; and let him not during the first 10 years of his life try to look into the twenties, nor the twenties into the thirties, nor the thirties into the forties, nor the forties into the fifties, nor the fifties into the sixties, not the sixties into the seventies. From the way the years have got the habit of racing along, I guess you will not have to wait a great while before all the seals of the future are broken. I would not give 2 cents to know how long I am going to live, or in what day of what year the world is going to be demolished. I would rather give $1,000 not to know. Suppose some one could break the next seal in the scroll of your personal history, and should tell you that on the 4th of July, 1890, you were to die, the summer after the next: how much would you be good for between this and that? It would from now until then be a prolonged funeral. You would be counting the months and the days, and your family and friends would be counting them; and next 4th of July you would rub your hands together and whine—"One year from today I am to go. Dear me! I wish no one had told me so long before. I wish that necromancer had not broken the seal of the future." And meeting some undertaker you would say: "I hope you will keep yourself free from an engagement the 4th of July, 1890. That day you will be needed at my house. To save time you might as well take my measure now, 5 feet, 11 inches." I am glad Christ dropped a thick veil over the hour of our demise and the hour of the world's destruction when he said: "Of that day and hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels, but my Father only." Keep your hands off the seven seals.

There is another mighty seven of the Bible, viz., the seven thunders. What those thunders mean we are not told, and there has been much guessing about them; but they are to come, we are told, before the end of all things, and the world cannot get along without them. Thunder is the the speech of lightning. There are evils in our world which must be thundered down, and which will require at least seven volleys to prostrate them. We are all doing nice, delicate, soft-handed work in churches and reformatory institutions against the evils of the world, and much of it amounts to a teaspoon dipping out the Atlantic ocean, or a clam shell digging away at a mountain, or a tack hammer smiting the Gibralter. What is needed is thunderbolts, and at least seven of them. There is the long line of fraudulent commercial establishments; every stone in the foundation, and every brick in the wall, and every nail in the rafter made out of dishonesty; skeletons of poorly paid sewing girls' arms in every beam of that establishment; human nerves worked into every figure of that embroidery; blood in the deep dye of that proffered upholstery, billions of dollars of accumulated fraud entrenched in massive storehouses and stock companies, manipulated by unscrupulous men until the monoply is defiant of all earth and all heaven. How shall the evil be overcome? By treatise on the maxim: Honesty is the best policy? Or by soft repitition of the golden rule that we must "do to others as we would have them do to us?" No, it will not be done that way. What is needed and what will come is the seven thunders. There is drunkenness backed up by a capital mightier than in any other business. Intoxicating liquors enough in this country to float a navy. Good grain to the amount of 57,950,000 annually destroyed to make the deadly liquid. Breweries, distilleries, gin shops, rum palaces, liquor associations, our nation spending annually $740,000,000 for rum, resulting in bankruptcy, disease, pauperism, filth, assassination, death, illimitable woe. What will stop them? High license? No. Prohibition laws? No. Churches? No. Moral suasion? No. Thunderbolts will do it nothing else will. Seven thunders.

Yonder are intrenched infidelity and atheism with their magazines of literature scoffing at our Christianity; their hoe printing presses busy day and night. There are their blaspheming apostles, Voltaries of the present as well as the past, reinforced by all the powers of darkness from highests demon to lowest imp. What will extirpate those monsters of infidelity and atheism? John Brown's shorter catechism about "Who made you?" or Westminster catechism about "What is the chief end of man?" No, thunderbolts! The seven thunders!

For the impurities of the world empalaced as well as collared, epaulletted as well as ragged, enthroned as well as ditched; for corrupt legislation which at times makes our state and national capitals a hemispheric stench; for superstitions that keep whole nations in squalor, century after century, their Juggernauts crushing, their knives lacerating, their waters drowning, their funeral pyres burning the seven thunders!

Oh, men and women, disheartened at the bad way things often go, hear you not a rumbling down the sky of heavy artillery, coming in on one side, the seven thunders of the Almighty? Don't let us try to wield them ourselves; they are too heavy and too fiery for us to handle; but God can and God will; and when all mercy has failed and all milder measure exhausted, then judgment will begin. Thunderbolts! Depend upon it, that what is not done under the flash of the seven candlesticks will be done by the trampling of the seven thunders.

But I leave this imperial and multipotent numeral seven where the Bible leaves it, imbedded in the finest wall that was ever built, or ever will be constructed, the wall of heaven. It is the seventh strata of precious stones that make up that wall. After naming six of the precious stones in that wall, the Bible cries out—"the seventh chrysolite!" The chrysolite is an exquisite green, and in that seventh layer of the heavenly wall shall be preserved forever the dominant color of the earth we once inhabited. I have sometimes been saddened at the thought that this world, according to science and revelation, is to be blotted out of existence, for it is such a beautiful world. But here in this layer of the heavenly wall, where the numeral seven is to be embedded, this strata of green is to be photographed, and embalmed and perpetuated, the color of the grass that covers the earth, the color of the foliage that fills the forest, the color of the sea. One glance at that green chrysolite, a million years after this planet has been extinguished, will bring to mind just how it looked in summer and spring, and we will say to those who were born blind on earth, and never saw at all in this world, after they have obtained full eyesight in heaven: "If you would know how the earth appeared in June and August, look at that seventh layer of the heavenly wall, the green of the chrysolite." And while we stand there and talk spirit with spirit, that old color of the earth which had more sway than all the other colors put together, will bring back to us our earthly experiences, and noticing that this green chrysolite is the seventh layer of crystalized magnificence we may bethink ourselves of the domination of that numeral seven over all other numerals, and thank God that in the dark earth we left behind us we so long enjoyed the light of seven golden candlesticks, and were all of us permitted to shine among the seven stars of more or less magnitude, and that all the seven seals of the mysterious future have been broken wide open for us by a loving Christ, and that the seven thunders, having done their work, have ceased reverberation, and that the numeral seven, which did such tremendous work in the history of nations on earth, has been given such a high place in that Niagara of colors, the wall of heaven, "the first foundation of which is jasper, the second sapphire, the third a chalcedony, the fourth an emerald, the fifth sardonyx, the sixth sardius, the seventh chrysolite."

"When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold;
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?"

Bank Thieves in America.

"A 'mob,'" said the detective, "consists usually of two men. One of them known as the 'stall' and the other the 'sneak.' The cashier, who usually faces the inclosure behind whech the clerks are at work, can be made to turn in his chair by the 'stall,' who will pretend to be deaf, and while talking about opening an account will lean over so as to get the the cashier's eyes away from the front of the building. In an instant the 'sneak,' with a pen behind his ear and ink on his fingers, perhaps wearing an inky office coat, is behind the railing, having entered through the cashier's room. He is skillful in turning rapidly so that his face is not seen, and knowing exactly where the money is located that he covets, he has it under his coat and is out of the inclosure and out of the building before any one knew even that he was there.

"There are two of the most expert 'mobs' of bank thieves in America at liberty this moment, any member of either of them being fully capable of carrying out just such a crime as I have described. It would not be expedient to make their names public. It is just as easy to rob a bank by the sneak method today as it was fifteen years ago. The only wonder is that there isn't more of it. Your average bank detective would not recognize the king of all bank sneaks who is alive and at liberty today if he walked in and asked him the time of day."—New York World.

The Excelsior mill books at Yankton show that its purchases of this year's crop of wheat average sixty-one pounds to the measured bushel.

The Press and Dakotaian claims that there is a wild rumor afloat that Watertown comes to Yankton with a bid of $100,000 in property for the Methodist university.

A farmer in Barnes county, while mowing, caught a skunk in his sickle. The machine was backed up to get rid of the obstruction and distance only lent enchantment to the spot.

The Argus-Leader throws out this pointer: "The next thing you will hear drop in Sioux Falls will be a $50,000 or $75,000 woolen mill—but never mind for particulars until the deal is closed out."

Ten saloonkeepers were arrested at Grand Forks for contempt of court in violating the injunction against selling liquor. Nine gave bonds to appear before Judge McConnell. Jack Jarvis was sent to jail.

A short time ago a well in the southern part of Sioux Falls that had been used by all the families in the neighborhood was cleaned. At the bottom of the well were found two snakes, four toads, old boots, tin pans and stovepipe.

In connection with other business transacted by the M. E. conference at Jamestown resolutions condemning publication of lottery advertisements and pledging the conference to endeavor to increase the circulation of papers refusing to publish such advertisements were adopted.

Sprague, the incurable insane patient who was returned to Lawrence county from the Yankton asylum, was sent to the county hospital at Gayville. He is not only insane but a crank. For several days he has not eaten a mouthful of food, and declares he never will, so long as he is in Dakota territory.

The Carthage news tells the following: "A lady living not more than five miles from Carthage one day, besides doing her housework and the chores at the stable, her husband being away that day helping a neighbor, dug twenty bushels of potatoes. That woman's husband thinks Dakota good enough for him."

The city of Deadwood is full of detectives, hatched out by the attempted train robbery. They stand around on every street corner and point out the mistakes that have been made. Every one of them knew that the cow would eat the grindstone, and that if they had been employed, or even consulted, the last one of the gang would have been captured or killed.

Two farmers named Jaster and Averill, living near Grafton, got into a dispute over a dog belonging to Averill which had been killed by Jaster's dog. Averill demanded payment for his dog, and upon being refused he seized a hoe and knocked Jaster down. Mrs. Jaster rushed to his assistance and received serious cuts from the hoe in the hands of Averill.

The Mormons confined in the United States wing of the penitentiary at Sioux Falls for practicing polygamy are very devout Christians. They never eat a meal without saying grace and pray fervently three times a day. At night before retiring when they offer prayers they pray for all the officials of the United States, from President Cleveland to Warden Fulenweider, who is their keeper. They seem to be contented and do not look upon themselves as prisoners, but as martyrs.

The latest sharp practice to secure a fee was by a well-known and prominent attorney in Deadwood who communicated the information that by reporting to the clerk of the court daily their presence when a case on trial had been adjourned for a certain number of days petit jurymen could collect their per diem during the time of adjournment. For this valuable information he sought to levy and collect an assessment of $1 from each juryman.

Forger James E. Bedell related in court in New York, how he squandered $127,000 of the $800,000 which he stole from his employers at the policy shop of Emerson & Foss. He was quite self possessed and unembarrassed throughout his narrative, despite the severe cross questioning of several big lawyers, and with perfect nonchalance, rehearsed the minute details of the execution of his rascality. While Charles Bedell was on the stand telling what he knew about brother James' policy shops, the pioneer forger of mortgages stepped aside to calculate the exact amount he had lost to Emerson & Foss. Bedell says that he is enjoying life in the Tombs, though he fears to break down for want of exercise.

Doctoring Royal Patients.

From Mrs. Hooper's Paris Letter.

It was a matter of wonder to many persons in Paris that Dr. Fauvel, the great French specialist in throat diseases, had not been summoned to attend the king of Spain at the commencement of his malady, especially as Dr. Fauvel had always attended Queen Isabella and her children during their residence in Paris for any troubles of that nature. But such a proceeding was forbidden by the strict rules of Spanish etiquette, which prohibits one of the royal family of Spain from being attended by any physician who is not a Spaniard by birth.

At the time of the illness of the young Queen Mercedes there resided in Madrid a German doctor who was especially famed for his treatment of typhoid fever, the disease from which the queen was suffering. He had recently saved the life of Mrs. J. R. Lowell who was suffering from a violent attack of that terrible malady. A few days before Queen Mercedes breathed her last her Spanish doctors sent for their German colleague and requested him to prescribe for their patient without seeing her. This he positively refused to do, saying that he must examine the physical condition of the queen before prescribing for her. But that could by no means be permitted.

"Then," he said, "let me merely see her—let me go to the door of her room and look at her without crossing the threshold."

Even that concession was refused.

"Then, gentlemen," he declared, "I can do nothing. I will not attempt to prescribe for a patient that I have not ever seen."

He withdrew from the palace, and a few days later the young queen was dead. But the sacred laws of Spanish regal etiquette had been preserved without infringement. A similar affair, but with a different denoument, took place a good many years ago in Russia. The late czarina, the mother of the present emperor of Russia, was shortly after her marriage attacked with a serious affection of the stomach. Up to that time no physician could approach the bedside of one of his lady patients of the imperial family nearer than ten feet. The empress grew worse and became alarmingly ill. The Emperor Alexander gave orders that a famous physician named Botkin, of whose skill in such cases he had heard should at once be sent for. Botkin came, and to the horror of his colleagues he walked straight up to the bedside of the empress and took hold of her wrist to feel her pulse. He was instantly hurried from the room and as loudly remonstrated with on the impropriety of his conduct, being told that his imperial patient was to be looked at from a distance and that he must not approach her, much less touch her. Botkin listened in silence to all that the other doctors had to say, but when the report of the consultation was drawn up he refused to sign it. The emperor, who was exceedingly anxious respecting Botkin's opinion, sent at once for the report, and on noticing the name of the new doctor did not appear in it, he caused him to be summoned at once to his presence.

"Your Majesty," quoth Botkin, frankly, "I can not pretend to treat a patient that I am not permitted to examine. The empress is, I learn, in a very critical situation. I think I can save her, but to do so I must be allowed to go to work in my own way."

The emperor rose from his chair, took Dr. Botkin by the arm and marched with him into the sick room of the empress and straight up to her bedside. "There, doctor," he said, "examine your patient, and if anyone pretends to interfere with you remember that you are obeying my commands." The course of treatment prescribed by the great physician proved successful. The empress was saved and that particular rule of imperial etiquette was abrogated forever.

Judge Black's Eloquence.

From the Pittsburgh Dispatch.

They tell a story of a friend of a Western Congressman who happened to be at the capitol, sightseeing, at the time the historic Milligan case was on trial before the Supreme Court. This Congressman was to make a great speech on a certain day, on some question or other, and his friend went up to the capitol to hear it. He somehow missed his way in the building, however, and wandered into the court room instead. There he saw a man of towering figure striding back and forth in the narrow space before the bench, arguing the case of the defendant, Milligan. Oratory is captivating to a Western man, and he stayed to listen a few minutes. Judge Black was denouncing trials by military commissions, and painting the iniquity of all the extrajudicial tribunals that ever in all history usurped the prerogatives of the duly-established courts. He instanced Herod, who, when unable to single out from the multitude of children the Christ child, who was to be King of the Jews, tried all the babies for prospective treason, convicted them, decreed their death, and had his sentence carried out with such alacrity and zeal that in one day the whole land was filled with mourning and lamentation. He cited Nero trying the whole Christain Church in a body on the charge of setting fire to Rome, and sending them to the cross. He described Macbeth's hired murderers, "the commission organized in Banquo's case, which sat upon him that very night at a convenient place beside the road, where it was known he would be travelling." He pictured Lola Montez, Minister and mistress to the King of Bavaria, and her "commission"—"a pack of British bulldogs, trained to tear the flesh and mangle the limbs and lap the life blood"—and much more which I cannot accurately recall. The Westerner stood and drunk it in with eager ears and eyes that hung on every gesture of the orator until, at the climax of the Montez instance, Judge Black thundered out:

"It gives me unspeakable pleasure to tell you the sequel. The people rose in their wrath, smashed down the whole machinery of oppression, and drove out into uttermost shame King, dogs, and strumpet——"

Then the listener rushed out of the chamber, hurried across into the hall of the house, pushed past the Doorkeeper, down the aisle to the desk where his friend was in the midst of his speech, and, plucking him by the coat-tail, exclaimed in a voice so loud as to be heard a dozen seats around: "Wind her up, Bill! Wind her up, and come over here and listen to old Jerry Black givin' 'em h—l!"

Serving a Warrant on Lost Mountain.

From Joel Chandler Harris's humorous and dramatic story, "Trouble on Lost Mountain," in the January Century, we take this characteristic incident of mountain life in northern Georgia: "On one occasion shortly after the war, Abe had gone to the little county town on business, and had been vexed into laying rough hands on one of the prominent citizens who was a trifle under the influence of liquor. A warrant was issued, and Dave McLendon, the sheriff of the county, a stumpy little man, whose boldness and prudence made him the terror of criminals, was sent to serve it. Abe, who was on the lookout for some such visitation, saw him coming, and prepared himself. He stood in the doorway, with his rifle flung carelessly across his left arm.

"'Hold on thar, Dave,' he cried, as the latter came up. The sheriff, knowing his man, halted.

"'I hate to fling away my manners, Dave,' he went on, 'but folks is gittin' to be mighty funny these days. A man's obleeged to s'arch his best frien's 'fore he kin find out the'r whichaways. Dave, what sort of a dockyment is you got ag'in me?'

"'I got a warrant, Abe,' said the sheriff, pleasantly.

"'Well, Dave, hit won't fetch me,' said Abe.

"'Oh, yes!' said the sheriff. 'Yes it will, Abe. I bin a-usin' these kind er warrants a mighty long time, an' they fetched a feller every whack.'

"'Now, I'll tall you what, Dave,' said Abe patting his rifle, 'I got a dockyment here that'll fetch you a blame sight quicker'n your dockyment'll fetch me; an' I tell you right now, plain an' flat, I haint a-gwine to be drug aroun' an' slapped in jail.'

The sheriff leaned carelessly against the rail fence in the attitude of a man who is willing to argue an interesting question.

"'Well, I tell you how I feel about it, Abe,' said the sheriff, speaking very slowly. 'You kin shoot me, but you can't shoot the law. Bang away at me, an' thar's another warrant after you. This yer one what I'm already got don't amount to shucks, so you better fling on your coat, saddle your horse, an' go right along wi' me thes ez neighborly ez you please.

"'Dave,' said Abe, 'if you come in at that gate you er a goner.'

"'Well, Abe,' the sheriff replied, 'I 'lowed you'd kick; I know what human natur' on these hills is, an' so I thes axed some er the boys to come along. They er right down thar in the holler. They hain't got no mo' idea what I come fer'n the man in the moon; yit they'd make a mighty peart posse. Tooby shore, a great big man like you ain't afeared fer ter face a little bit er law.'

"Abe Hightower hesitated a moment, and then went into the house. In a few minutes he issued and went out to the gate where the sheriff was. The faces of the two men were a study. Neither betrayed any emotion or alluded to the warrant. The sheriff asked after the 'crap,' and Abe told him it was 'middlin' peart,' and asked him to go into the house and make himself at home until the horse could be saddled. After a while the two rode away. Once during the ride Abe said:

"'I'm mighty glad it wa'nt that feller what run agi'n you last fall, Dave.'

"'Why?' asked the sheriff.

"'Bekaze I'd 'a' plugged him, certain an' shure,' said Abe.

"'Well,' said the sheriff, laughing, 'I wuz a-wishin' mighty hard thes about that time that the t'other feller had got 'lected.'"

A Curiosity of Texas Cows.

Mr. Frank Wilkeson relates in The Rhode Island Star this curious incident of the half-wild life of Texas cows, which harbored their young in a sixty-five-acre piece of bottom land where the coarse blue-joint grass grew with canebrake rankness, and where one spring he knew twenty calves were continually concealed:

"Every morning cow after cow would slip out of the herd and disappear in the tall grass. After an absence of an hour or two they would return to the herd. In the late afternoon they would again disappear, to rejoin the herd just about corralling time. When the calves were three or four days old their mothers would bring them out into the herd, and their places in the grass would be occupied by younger calves. Once I desired to see the young calves, and I rode into the grass to hunt for them. After an assiduous search I found one lying prone on the earth, with its head and neck extended and pressed into the thick mat of old grass that lay on the ground. The little creature lay perfectly quiet, watching my horse. It did not so much as wink its dark eyes when I dismounted and extended my hand toward it. I leaned over it. It watched me intently, but did not stir. I dropped my hand on its head.

"Instantly it was on its feet and calling loudly for protection, calling that the wolf, its mother had told of, had come. I heard twenty mother cows bellow in answer to the calf's call that they were coming. The dry grass snapped and cracked in all directions as the maddend cows rushed wildly to their young. I mounted my horse and quickly rode away from the spot. Each cow ran in a direct line to the place where its calf was hidden. The entire herd rushed into the cover to do battle for the calf. What an uproar there was! Cows, steers, bulls, all calling loudly to one another in angry, excited tones. I had a foolish setter dog with me and he had to mix himself into the trouble. The first cow that saw him bellowed to the others that she saw the wolf. They all pursued him, and he, doglike, fled to my protection and my own cows gave me a brisk chase as I galloped over the prairie. The herd were excited and angry for hours.

At the time of the great railroad strike in 1877 Mr. Vanderbilt made a plain business statement to the employes on his roads, and then ordered the regular 10 per cent. reduction. Of the 12,000 employes only 500 expressed dissatisfaction. They protected the property, and Aug. 1 the millionaire manager sent a gratuity of $100,000 for pro rata distribution among them, with the announcement, "Your pay will be increased the moment the business of the country will justify it."

This "fear of the Lord" is incorporated by Shakespeare in the impression left upon us by his great tragedies in a way far more effectual than if he were invariably to apportion rewards and punishments in the fifth act with a neat and ready hand to his good and evil characters. It is enough for him to engage our loyalty and love for human worth, wherever and however we meet with it, and to make us rejoice in its presence whether it find in this world conditions favorable to its action or the reverse. This we might name the principle of faith in the province of ethics, and there at all events we are saved by faith. The innocent suffer in Shakespeare's plays as they do in real life; but all our hearts go with them. Which of us would not choose to be Duncan lying in his blood rather than Macbeth upon the throne? Which of us would not choose rather to suffer wrong with Desdemona than rejoice in accomplished villainy with Iago? But Macbeth, Iago, Edmund, Richard III., King Claudius, and the other malefactors of Shakespeare's plays do not indeed triumph in the final issue. "The conscience of mankind refuses to believe in the ultimate impunity of guilt, and looks upon the flying criminal as only taking a circuit to his doom." Shakespeare here rightly exhibits things foreshortened in the tract of time. Though the innocent and the righteous may indeed, if judged from a merely external point of view, appear as losers in the game of life, the guilty can never in the long run be the winners. The baser types, which for a time seem to flourish in violation of the laws of health or the spiritual laws of the inner life, inevitably tend toward sterility and extinction. The righteous have not set their hearts on worldly success or prosperity, and they do not attain it; a dramatic poet may courageously exhibit the fact; but what is dearer they attain—a serene conscience and a tranquil assurance that all must be well with those supported by the eternal laws. But the guilty ones, whose aim has been external success, and who have challenged the divine laws or hoped to evade them, are represented as failing in the end to achieve that poor success on which their hearts have been set. "I have seen the wicked in great power * * * but I went by, and lo, he was not." Follow a malefactor far enough, Shakespeare says, and you will find that his feet must needs be caught in the toils spread for those who strive against the moral order of the world. Nor can pleasure evade those inexorable laws any more than can crime. A golden mist with magic inhalations and strange glamour, pleasure may rise for an hour; but these are the transitory glories of sunset vapors, which night presently strikes into sullen quietude with her leaden mace. This is what Shakespeare has exhibited in his "Antony and Cleopatra." All the sensuous witchery of the East is there displayed; but behind the gold and the music, the spicery and the eager amorous faces rise the dread forms of actors on whom the players in that stupendous farce-tragedy had not reckoned, the forms of the calm avenging laws.—Dowden, in the Fortnightly Review.

Ways of the Manatee.

As a reporter of the New York Telegram was walking along South street a young fellow with a loud voice called attention to some sea cows—the first ever exhibited in New York, he said. A pleasant looking man said he had brought the beasts from their native haunts after a great deal of trouble. There were three of them, weighing respectively 610, 650 and 815 pounds.

The proprietor told the reporter that he would show him their resemblance to the cow, and, leaning over the edge of the tank in which the two smallest ones were confined, caught one by the jaw and told it to lift its head up, which it did. Then the man opened the beast's mouth, which is exactly like the cow in shape and appearance. The animal's head is very much like a cow's head but for the large, overhanging eyebrows and the absence of horns.

"The manatee, or cow," said the man, "is found in all tropical waters, but chiefly in the Caribbean sea. It subsisted entirely on vegetable matter and is never known to touch fish or animal food; consequently its flesh is much sought after by natives and sailors near where it abounds, and in consequence the manatee has become nearly extinct. It is one of the most harmless animals of the sea; yet it has an enemy in the shark, who follows it hours at a time hoping to get a taste of its flesh. The cow has no weapon of defense, but is a wonderful swimmer and is able to outswim the shark with great ease.

"The manatee eats all kinds of vegetables and grasses, and in captivity it eats common meadow grass. The three I have here," said the proprietor, "were caught by me off the southern coast of Florida. They are very hard to catch alive. They have such great power in their tails, which sometimes measure 5 feet in length, that they often break the strongest nets. They can't stay under water longer than seven minutes, consequently we have to bring them to the surface in that time to get air, otherwise they would drown, and then let them drop in the water until we can get them aboard ship, but when once there they will live for two weeks out of water.

"There's a grass called sea grass that grows in the ocean to a height of about 6 or 7 feet, and when we see it floating on the water it is a sign that the manatees are about, and we lay our nets for them accordingly. They are mostly found in pairs, but if attacked by sharks they will form in battle array, surrounding their young to protect them. The three that I have here I expect to keep.

Four men at Gainesville, Fla., in twenty days killed 600 alligators for their hides and teeth.

And now the doctors at Jacksonville, Fla., are reported to have got into a quarrel. What malign influence is it that makes the medical profession balance its healing work by inflicting corresponding wounds on each other's reputation?

In Germany the wheat crop has been secured in better condition than seemed likely a month ago. The southern kingdoms have a better yield than the north, so that the total wheat crop of the New German empire is not now thought to be more than five per cent. under an average.

Perseverance is not always rewarded as it deserves. Mrs. Sorrenson, of Manistee, Michigan, sat in a rocking chair across the path of the tracklayers for and obnoxious railway, for more than a day and night, only to be arrested and sent to jail in the end for obstructing the march of improvement.

A convict named Cassidy, confined in the Georgia State prison for murder, is a man of phenomenal strength. While passing a lumber yard at the time he was taken to the penitentiary he picked up a piece of timber ten feet long and four inches thick and twirled it on his fingers as easily as a man of ordinary strength would a cane.

Queen Victoria recently commissioned one of her loyal subjects in Washington to procure for her an autograph of Gen. Jackson, whom she much admired. The messenger secured a letter written to a member of the House, in which the President said he hoped Congress would pass a bill prohibiting the delivery of mails on Sunday.

It is stated that vessels built of African teak wood have lasted 100 years, to be then broken up because of faulty models. Its weight is from forty-two to fifty-two pounds per cubic foot; it works easily, but wears the tools rapidly on account of the quantity of silex in it. It also contains an oil which prevents the iron in contact with it from rusting.

The largest Christian place of worship in the world is the church of St. Peter's in Rome, which has a capacity for a congregation of 54,000 persons. The three next in order of size are: Milan Cathedral, which holds 32,000, St. Paul's, Rome, which will contain 32,000. The space covered by the buildings of St. Peter's is said to be 240,000 square feet, or about five and a half English acres.

There is a "congressional bootblack," and his name is Dan Appleton, aged 10. He managed to make his way from St. Paul to Washington, and going up to the house asked for Congressman Nelson. The congressman came out, and the boy said: "I am Dan Appleton, a bootblack from Minnesota, and I want you to give me the privilege of blacking congressmen's boots here in the building. Nelson took the boy to Architect Clark, who gave him the privilege, and the lad is making money.

An ingenious contributor to the Berlin Neue Musikzeitung elaborates the theory that the character of a man is to be predicted from the special vowel which predominates in his laughter. For instance, he says, persons in whose laughter the letter A (sound ah) is dominant are open, jovial, honest folk, who delight in noise and movement. "Laughter in E" is an indication of the phlegmatic and melancholic. Children almost invariably "laugh in I," and this is also observable in persons of a naive, docile, modest, or undecided character. "Laughter in O," which the writer regards as the most dignified of all the laughing tones, is the mark of noble and bold tempers. The worst of all the laughters is that in U, which is the characteristic of the misanthropical.

About Washington.

Surgeon General Hamilton has written to the governor of Florida; suggesting the enactment of a law by the legislature, which meets next month, for the establishment of a state board of health and auxiliary boards in each of the counties for the better sanitary protection of the state. He submits a draft of a bill to meet that object. This provides that the state board of health shall consist of five members, to be appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the state senate, and that the county boards shall consist of three members each. The state board is empowered to prepare and enforce rules and regulations to prevent the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, the management of quarantine inspection stations, etc.

Record of Casualties.

The unknown man found dead at Kent, Minn., was killed by the cars. He was riding on the trucks of the passenger train from St. Paul going north and fell off, the wheels running over him. The corner's jury found a verdict to that effect. His name is believed to be Larson.

Patsey Cannon, a Northern Pacific brakeman, while under the influence of liquor, jumped from the second story window of the New York house at Livingston, Montana. His fall resulted in both arms being broken and terrible bruises about his head and body. His injuries will probably prove fatal.

A full-rigged, three-masted ship was capsized by the wind in Buttermilk channel, off the mouth of the Atlantic basin near New York. The vessel overturned on a tug-boat which was passing at the time. The smoke stack of the tug was broken off. The ship that capsized was the Spanish brig Almogavar, of Barcelona. The tug which she struck was seriously damaged, but did not sink. No lives were lost.

Personal Talk.

While Joaquin Miller, the poet of the Seirras, was engaged in the pastime of shooting quail as he was riding over the hills near Oakland. Col. his horse jumped and a 22-caliber bullet went through his left hand. It missed the bones and only made a painful flesh wound. The only danger is from lockjaw.

Mrs. James G. Blaine, Jr., was taken suddenly sick at the house of a friend in Madison square New York. A physician was called, but before he arrived her condition was so critical that it was thought unsafe to remove her to the New York hotel, where she is living with her father and mother, Col. and Mrs. Nevins. She rallied somewhat during the evening and the physician finally consented to allow her to be removed to her rooms in the hotel. This was done, and Dr. Fuller, who was first called in to attend her, sought the advice of Dr. Smith, who lives at the hotel. They stayed with Mrs. Blaine all night, and a professional nurse sent for. She was in a semi-delirious state, and did not recognize those who were with her. The physicians said that the chances were against her recovery.

Man's Wicked Doings.

David Sellers and wife, living about six miles east of Mount Gilead, Ohio, were murdered and the house fired to hide the evidences of the crime. Sellers was wealthy and known to carry large sums of money on his person. There is no clue.

Louis Smith, a colored man, who lately came to Washington from Minneapolis to act as coachman for Mrs. Bean, is under arrest for alleged burglary. He is said to have broken into the house of a man named Cowie, and was caught by two young ladies, the daughters of the family.

The mail pouch that left Boston recently and arrived in Chicago next day over the Michigan Southern railroad was robbed of all the first class mail matter it contained. The stolen package consisted of registered letters, and the supposition is that a large amount of money was secured by the thief.

Mrs. T. J. Lynch, a young and wealthy lady, threw herself from the window of her room in the Hotel Bristol, New York, and was instantly killed. Mr. and Mrs. Lynch had just returned from Europe, where Mrs. Lynch had gone for the benefit of her health. She had been suffering from a severe case of typhoid fever for several days.

Two members of the city police force were arrested at Fargo, no complaint of Joseph Kuchl of Sargent county, charging them with having robbed him of $500 while coming from Moorhead together in a carriage. Kuchl himself was arrested on the charge of having robbed another party of $25.

Two beautiful daughters of a game keeper have been found murdered in a forest near Leakau, Moravia. The breasts of one of the girls were severed while the other was pinned to the ground with a spike driven through the abdomen. The motive for the crime is supposed to have been jealousy.

George Purdy, a young man, was riddled with bullets and killed one mile northeast of Lebanon, Ind., and persons who witnessed the shooting from a little distance say that it was a political murder. Purdy was shouting for Harrison, and some unknown men driving up from behind commenced firing their revolvers at him.

Benjamin Carter was hanged at Rawlins, Wyoming, for the murder of John Jeffreys, a boy. At his request, newspaper reporters were not present at the execution. Carter walked to the scaffold unsupported. His last words were: "I am going to leave you; but I will see you again. Good-bye." His neck was broken by the fall and death was instantaneous. The crime for which Carter was hanged occurred in the fall of 1886. One night he entered the tent where Jeffrey and several other cowboys were sleeping. He ordered Jeffrey to get up, and when he did so Carter shot him through the head. He was captured the following day and narrowly escaped lynching.

A sensation was created at Racine, Wis., by the announcement that W. A. Booth, secretary and bookkeeper of the Fish Brothers' Wagon company, had suddenly disappeared, and was short on his accounts from $1,000 to $5,000. Booth left the office with a lot of drafts, which he was to have deposited with the bank, but failed to do so. Instead, he cashed a certificate of deposit on his own name for $600 and made a futile effort to cash the company's note in his favor for $2,500. The first intimation of any crookedness was received upon investigation of the books where entries were made which Mr. Booth could not explain. It is believed his shortage will reach anywhere from $2,000 to $5,000.

Ex-Postmaster McNamara, of Minot, Dak., was brought before Justice Sullivan, and in view of the recent developments in the case, his bonds were reduced to $500, which were readily produced. The case has attracted considerable attention, as the postmaster was in jail on a warrant charging him with the embezzlement of $3,500. The examination of the books was evidently made in a very careless manner, and it is doubtful if, after his books have been correctly audited, the shortage will not amount to very much, if anything. The postoffice inspector who examines the books was said to have been considerably under the influence of election fluid while at Minot, and this is probably the reason the case was handled in this way.

From Foreign Lands.

The Germania (Catholic) asserts that the papal note to the nuncios at foreign courts will emphasize the fact that Emperor William's visit, having led to occurences that could not fail to wound the pontiff, has made the position of the pope still more deplorable.

Advices received by the steamer Moselle, which arrived at Aspinwall the 10th inst., from Hayti, state that never before had Port au Prince passed such a night as that of Sept., 28. The night, to begin with, was dreadfully dark, the heavens being a mass of black clouds, with an occasional flash of lightning. Revolution was abroad. The firing commenced at 7:30 and the cannon and Gatling guns of the place did dreadful execution, as did also the shots from the big guns in Fort Alexander, which crashed through the buildings, destroying everything and everybody with which they came in contact. The firing lasted until 2 a. m. of the 29th. These advices say, that as far as had been ascertained, 800 persons were killed and over 500 wounded, including many women and children. Among the notable persons killed besides Gen. Seide Telemache were Mesdames Charles Borno and Ducass.

News Generalities.

A laughable incident occurred at Washburn, Wis., which will cost a contractor quite a sum. He had a contract for repairing the Congregational church chimney, and told one of his men to tear the old one down. The man misunderstood him and tore down the chimney of the Catholic church instead. It will have to be rebuilt at the expense of the contractor.

The obsequies of Rt. Rev. Bishop Welles, of the Episcopal diocese of Milwaukee, took place at Milwaukee. The services at the cathedral were very impressive, and the cortege, preceeded by a procession of robed priests behind a cross bearer, attracted much attention as it slowly proceeded through the city toward Forest Home cemetery.

The United States Circuit Judge Sawyer rendered a decision at San Francisco in the care of ten Chinese, sailors on the Panama steamer Colima, who had shipped for round-trip voyage and who were refused landing by the collector on their return on the ground that they had been outside the United States. Judge Sawyer permitted them to land, holding that the ten sailors had not left the United States in the common acceptance of that term, and that they were under American jurisdiction as well as in an American vessel and in American territory.

The first train to pass through the Wickes tunnel, on the Montana Central railroad, was the excursion to Boulder. The passage occupied just twelve minutes, and was made safely. The tunnel is eighteen miles from Helena, on the Montana Central branch to Butte, and runs through a large mountain the Boulder divide. It is 6,200 feet long, and is the largest in Montana. It runs through solid rock and its constructions cost about a million and a half. It was built by Larson, Keefe & Co. of Helena. Work was commenced in May, 1887, and daylight was let through it in September, 1888. The trains will henceforth run through the tunnel regularly. It is the intention of the company to line the tunnel with masonry, which will necessitate a further outlay of a quarter of a million dollars.

Alarming reports come from Enterprise, Florida. Rumors that yellow fever was widely prevalent there have been rife. In response to a query Dr. King Wylly of Sanford (five miles across Lake Monroe from Enterprise) says: "Yes, several cases. See my letter to Dr. Porter." According to his report the fever has existed in Enterprise since last June. Nearly twenty cases are now reported, and two or three deaths. Doctors Cowan and Long have the fever. The population of the town is about seven hundred: The people are panickstricken. They have kept their troubles secret until now. There are no disinfectants in the place. Mayor Lilienthal of Sanford has requested aid of the Jacksonville authorities. Enterprise is in Volusia county. Orange county has quarantined against it. Thirty men, armed and mounted, guard all avenues of exit. The action of the authorities there in concealing this state of affairs is severly censured on all sides.

The people of Brownsville, Tex., are greatly excited over the bombardment of a residence near that town by invisible hands. One night the lightkeeper's house at Point Isabel, occupied by Mrs Schreiber, widow of the late keeper, was struck by a shower of shingle nails The occupants paid little attention to it until the next night, when about dark the shower of nails began again. Next night the bombardment was continued, brickbats being added to the shell and nails, and every now and then an old scrap of iron or copper casting. A crowd collected and a deputy sheriff from Brownsville, who was sent down to investigate, made a careful search, but could discover no source from whence the shower of missiles came. The superstitious mariners at the point insist that ghosts are the offenders. As the light is not in operation they firmly believe a legend started, that during the war it was put out one night by a light keeper in league with wreckers, and a schooner was enticed ashore, and stoutly maintain that the ghosts of the drowned sailors are kicking up the present trouble as a mark of their disapproval of the absence of this needed beacon.

A Widow Interviews Sitting Bull.

A very touching scene occured at the Sherman house just before the Indians left. Mrs. Catherine McLaughlin of Galesburg, Ill., came to St. Paul a few days ago to await the return of the Indians. Mrs. McLaughlin lost a son in the Custer massacre, and her earnest desire is to recover his remains. She vainly hoped to obtain some information from some of the chiefs which might lead to their recovery. When she reached the hotel in St. Paul she saw the cruel features of an Indian pressed against the glass in the front door.

"That is he, that is he," she cried rather hysterically, "I recognize him from his picture," and so it proved to be.

She disengaged herself from her friend's arm and slowly approached old Bull. Reaching his side she suddenly demanded:

"Where is my boy buried? You know, you murderous old wretch, for you killed him."

Sitting Bull made no response, nor did he change his position. Interpreter Primean stepped up to Mrs. McLaughlin and inquired what the trouble was.

"That old wretch there is the murderer of my boy," she said, "and I want to know where he is buried."

"Why, madam, they are all buried where they fell—on the battlefield at Little Big Horn. A large monument marks the spot, and I think all the graves are also marked separately."

Mrs. McLaughlin turned from the interpreter and looked at Bull. He turned and caught the glance, then turned away again. Primeau spoke a few words to him in his native tongue and he turned again suddenly and eyed the lady. She was still looking at him with hatred written on her face, and as he looked up she advanced toward him. He dropped his eyes and walked to the other side of the room. Mrs. McLaughlin followed and repeated her question:

"Where is my boy?"

The old wretch merely dropped his head.

"He does not understand you, madam," said the interpreter, "and it is useless to question him. He would not even answer me."

"You miserable, cowardly red wretch," she said, walking over to Bull again. "Heaven will one day repay you for your work."

Then she was joined by her escort and they moved away. There were tears in her eyes and not a few persons were moved by the scene. She may not be unsuccessful for Agent McLaughlin promises his aid in the matter.

"I knew the lady's son," said Major McLaughlin, "and was drawn to him particularly because his nose was the same as mine. He belonged to troop L, of Custer's cavalry and fell with the rest on the Little Big Horn. He was a good fellow and a good soldier. I will do what I can to aid the lady in the matter. Sitting Bull and Gall never mention the massacre, unless some friend draws them aside and questions them about it."

The Winnipeg Railroad Row.

A telegram from Winnipeg describing the military preparations for effecting a crossing of the Canadian Pacific railway by another railway known as the Portage line implied that the Northern Pacific company were building the new line and was consequently a party to the fray. A reporter called at the Northern Pacific office in New York to get the facts, which are substantially these: All the newspaper statements regarding the present alleged conflict in the province of Manitoba between the Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific are incorrect. The Northern Pacific has nothing whatever to do with the contest. The road that is to pass the Canadian Pacific main line, the crossing of which is the occasion of the trouble, is not built by the Northern Pacific, but by the provincial government of Manitoba. That government chartered a company called the Northern Pacific & Manitoba Railroad company, which is to have control of all the roads built by the provincial government and to build other subsidized lines in the province. Even that company is not building the line first referred to. The provincial government constructed it at its own expense and risk and turns it over when completed to the chartered company. The Northern Pacific has no direct or indirect interest whatever in the Northern Pacific & Manitoba Railroad company. Its only relations to-day are through the medium of the Duluth & Manitoba Railroad company, a branch of the Northern Pacific extending from its main line to the Manitoba boundary and there connecting with the Red River Valley road to Winnipeg, built by the provincial government. The Northern Pacific & Manitoba Railroad company will have a traffic contract with that company and with the Northern Pacific company, and that will be the only connection between them.

The British Ministers Faux Pas.

The whole country is excited over a letter written by the British Minister at Washington on American politics, and the correspondence is given herewith, a matter of general interest, without any of the assertions, denials or explanations which are given by politicians and party journals.

THE LETTER.

The following is the letter to Minister West which called for the much criticised reply:

POMONA, Cal., Sept. 14, 1888.—To the British Minister, Washington, D. C.—Sir: The gravity of the political situation here and the duty of those voters who are of English birth, but still consider England the mother land, constitute the apology I hereby offer for intruding for information. Mr. Cleveland's message to congress on the fishery question justly excites our alarm and compels us to seek further knowledge before finally casting our votes for him as we had intended to do. Many English citizens have for years refrained from being naturalized, as they thought no good would accrue from the act, but Mr. Cleveland's administration has been so favorable and friendly toward England, so kind in not enforcing the retaliatory act passed by congress, so sound on the free trade question and so hostile to the dynamite school of Ireland that Englishmen by the hundreds—yes, by the thousands—they have become naturalized for the express purpose of helping to elect him again. The one above all American politicians they consider their own and their country's best friend.

I am one of these unfortunates with a right to vote for President in November. I am unable to understand for whom I shall cast my ballot, when but one month ago I was sure Mr. Cleveland was the man. If Cleveland was pursuing a new policy toward Canada temporarily only and for the sake of obtaining popularity and continuation of his office four years more, but intends to cease his policy when his re-election is secured in November and again favor England's interest, then I should have no further doubts, but go forward and vote for him. I know of no one better able to direct me, sir, and I most respectively ask your advice in the matter. I will further add that the two men—Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Harrison—are very evenly matched and a few votes may elect either one. Mr. Harrison is a high tariff man, a believer on the American side of all questions and undoubtedly an enemy to British interests generally.

This state is equally divided between the parties, and a mere handful of our naturalized countrymen can turn it either way. When it is remembered that a small state (Colorado) defeated Mr. Tilden in 1876 and elected Hayes, the Republican, the importance of California is at once apparent to all. As you are at the fountain head of knowledge on the question, and know whether Mr. Cleveland's present policy is temporary only, and whether he will as soon as he secures another term of four years in the presidency, suspend it for one of friendship and free trade, I apply to you privately and confidentially for information which shall in turn be treated as entirely secret. Such information would put me at rest myself, and if favorable to Mr. Cleveland enabled me, on my own responsibility, to assure many of our countrymen that they would do England a service by voting for Cleveland and against the Republican system of tariff. As I before observed, we know not what to do, but look for more light on a mysterious subject. The sooner this information comes the better will it serve true Englishmen in casting their votes. Yours very respectfully.

E. MURCHISON.

THE REPLY.

Private—Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of the 4th inst., and beg to say that I fully appreciate the difficulty in which you find yourself in casting your vote. You are probably aware that any political party which openly favored the mother country at the present moment would lose popularity, and that the party in power is fully aware of this fact. The party, however, is I believe, still desirous of maintaining friendly relation with Great Britain, and is still desirous of settling all questions with Canada, which have been unfortunately reopened since the rejection of the treaty by the Republican majority in the Senate and by the President's message, to which you alude. All allowances must therefore be made for the political situation as regards the presidential election, thus created. It is, however, impossible to predict the course which President Cleveland may pursue in the matter of retaliation, should he be elected, but there is every reason to believe that, while upholding the position he has taken, he will manifest a spirit of conciliation in dealing with the question involved in his message. I enclose an article from the New York Times of Aug. 22, and remain, yours faithfully,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

A Dakota Building Collapses.

An accident occurred at the insane hospital at Yankton, Dak., by which Christopher Thompson was instantly killed, Jacob Lee fatally hurt, Supt. D. H. Kean dangerously and Michael Curry slightly injured. All the men live in Yankton excepting Kean, whose home is at Canton. This disaster was the result of the caving in of the walls of one of the new wings to the hospital, now under construction under a contract with a man named Pattee of Canton. The victims were on top a large arch on the level of the third floor of the structure when the arch suddenly spread, the outside walls of the building falling outward and some of the interior walls going down in the general wreck. Nine other arches in the structure also gave way, the interior mass of brick, mortar and timbers falling through to the first floor. With this debris went the four men. Thompson and Lee had their chests crushed in, and were otherwise injured about the head and body. Kean and Curry are hurt about the head and bruised over the body. Kean was superintendent of construction and the other victims carpenters. It is probable the entire structure will have to be torn down before reconstruction can safely begin. Several other arches in the building have given away during the past few weeks, fortunately without injury to any one. The matter is now in the hands of Coroner McGlumphy for investigation and he will go to the bottom of it. The enquiry will be a lengthy one and in the end the public will know who is to blame for this rotten structure. Men at work on the building all quit after the accident. Some of them state there were two course of brick fitted between with bats and mortar, which constituted the support for heavy iron finishing, and the mortar, they state, was nearly all sand.

Surgeon Porter reports to the marine hospital bureau from Jacksonville, Fla., that there are nine cases of yellow fever at Enterprise, Fla., six of which are critical, and that Dr. C. Long is the only physician there. He adds that Dr. Posey will go to Enterprise. Dr. Porter has been authorized to purchase whatever fumigating material is needed at Enterprise.

The Democratic party believes in a revision of the tariff and in a free list that will encourage the importation of foreign goods.

The Difference.

An American tariff reformer while walking through the holy precincts of the British museum found himself face to face with an Egyptian mummy.

"Oh, see the corpse," said the American tariff reformer.

"No," said the Egyptian, "I am not a corpse, I am a mummy."

"Indeed? said the American. "You must be something like me. I am not a free trader, but a tariff reformer."

And then the mummy winked his eye and the tariff reformer smiled and went his way.

Eggs and Cotton.

Gov. Foraker made some exceedingly strong points in his address at New Haven. Here is one "nugget" which is worth the attention of farmers:

"When I was a boy I lived on a farm. I well remember selling eggs for three cents a dozen, and paying thirty-five and thirty-eight cents a yard for cotton cloth purchased in the markets of the world. That was under free trade.

"To-day you can purchase all the cotton cloth you want for eight and ten cents a yard and you sell your eggs for from twenty-five to forty cents a dozen. That is protection. That is what protection to home industries and home markets has done for the country. Which do you like best?"

A Protectionist Then.

Hon. William W. Eaton of Connecticut said in the House of Representatives four years ago on the subject of protection:

"To the members of this house I desire to address myself, to those who are talking of robbery, of plunder, of corruption, stealing and thievery. There is not a single article bought in the South, from the wagon that draws the farmer's cotton to the markets to the pin that his wife uses, that is not 50 per cent cheaper than it was fifteen years ago. No matter how wrong the principle of protection may be, that is the fact. I grant you that it is wrong; but the fact remains the same. It has cheapened everything under God's heaven's that men, women and children use in this land—everything."

Rampant Sectionalism.

Collate the provisions of the Mills bill regarding certain special northern and southern products in tabular form, and the result is suggestive to say the least. Like this, for instance:

Northern lumber	no duty
Northern wool	no duty
Northern salt	no duty
Northern vegetables	no duty
Northern brick	no duty
Northern tin plate	no duty
Northern lime	no duty
Louisiana sugar	68 per cent duty
Southern rice	109½ per cent duty

To this list might be added bituminous coal on which the Mills bill retains the duty, not because it is mined in some parts of Pennsylvania, but because it is common throughout several southern states: pigiron, on which the duty is retained, not because it is a northern produce, but because it is begining to be made in half a dozen southern states; wood screws, not because the making of wood screws is a flourishing industry in Connecticut, but because Mr. Vance flatly told Mr. Mills he wouldn't help the solid south into the saddle by his vote unless the product of his town were protected in the future as in the past, etc., etc.—Norwich Bulletin.

Cleveland and Oleomargarine.

It is asserted by the New York Sun that when the anti-oleomargarine bill was presented to President Cleveland two years ago he wrote a message vetoing it. He happened to show it to Congressman William L. Scott, one of the present members of the Democratic national committee. Mr. Scott was frightened at the possible consequences of the message and induced the President to reverse his decision by saying that New York would otherwise certainly be lost, and 20 or 30 seats in Congress besides. In his message of approval the President used his own argument as points brought forward by enemies of the measure, converting them with arguments from the other side.

This is a specimen of Mr. Cleveland's "backbone" which the Mugwump press is praising. —Albany Journal.

Good Old Free Trade Times.

Thus exclaims the Hartford Post: Talk about the "good old times" of a low tariff. Here is an instance: A man who has been in the mercantile business in an interior town in Illinois over thirty years recently looked over his old accounts, and found therein some interesting facts for tariff reformers. For example, in 1860 a customer is charged $3.75 for a barrel of salt, and credited 50 cents per day for two days' work. Salt was then on the free list, and labor was on a free trade basis. In that same year brown muslin sold for 11, 12½, and 15 cents per yard; present prices, 6 to 8 cents. Axes were then sold at $1.25 to $1.50; a better implement can now be bought at $1. The entire list ranged from 20 to 100 per cent. above latter-day prices. Is the country "hankering" for a return of these "good old times?"

Democratic Frauds Threatened.

A Southern Democratic Senator, talking the other day in one of the committee rooms in the Capitol at Washington to a Northern Democratic Congressman, said that Northern people "are d—d fools if they think the Democratic party is going out of power simply because the purchase or counting of a few votes in New York city is the only thing that can stand in the way." There was a Northern Republican in the committee room, but the others did not know him. They were not talking for publication. They are not the only Democrats either who feel just that way about the political situation. The Republican National Committee, too, and the Republican leaders generally, are doubtless fully aware what tactics are proposed in the remaining three weeks of the campaign. "The Democrats," says Senator Chandler of New Hampshire, "are prepared for desperate deeds to carry Indiana, New Jersey and New York. The worse their prospect the more desperate they are. With all their money and hold of the offices, why can they not hire men to vote and count fraudulently? The risk is no greater than burglary, the reward much greater. If the Republicans are active and sleepless nothing can defeat us."

They Sacrifice Wool and Save Sugar.

Wool is a product of nearly all parts of the Union, and a moment's thought will convince any one that if protection is beneficial it could not be applied to any industry which would distribute its profits more widely than would be done by a wool tariff.

The entire area devoted to sugar production in this country is not as large as ten Iowa townships, according to a statement made by ex-Governor Gear, of Iowa, in a congressional debate last summer. In 50 years the entire sugar production of the United States has aggregated but $600,000,000, while in 15 years the duties upon that article have amounted to $700,000,000. Every consumer of refined sugar to-day pays a tribute of 2½ cents a pound to a sugar trust. In view of these undisputed facts no tariff reformer can consistently assail the Republican position, especially as the Mills bill itself proposes a reduction of 15 per cent. in the sugar tariff.

The framers of the Mills bill well understood that consistency required them to make a heavy reduction in the sugar tariff, but they found that this would reduce revenues so greatly that wool could not then be made free. So they determined to sacrifice the interests of the whole people to the avarice of Southern sugargrowers. That cowardly evasion of duty was confessed by Congressman Breckenridge, of Kentucky, and has been endorsed by the Democratic party. The people will show their opinion of that transaction by their votes in November.—Albany Journal.

Where Ignorance Reigns.

Louisiana casts eight electoral votes for president, and in the present balance of parties no Democratic candidate can be elected without these votes. If Free Trade wins it will be with the aid of them and in no other way. For twelve years the Democratic party has had absolute control of the state. The campaign last Spring, like those which preceded, was carried by murder and intimidation. No one seriously denies this. The only defense made is that this is the only way in which a reign of plunder set up by ignorant voters can be prevented.

Yet, after twelve years of Democratic administration, the proportion of ignorant voters increases instead of diminishing. We wonder how many Northern voters know that this state has a majority of voters who can not read and write? If a deadly blow is dealt our Protective system at the coming election it will be by the vote of an electorate which Senator Gibson, its representative, gives as having this proportion of men who make their mark:

	Write.	Make Mark.	Excess Ill. over Literate.
White	90,945	23,986	Lit. 75,059
Total	112,955	126,929	Ill. 13,973

This is an appalling tribute of ignorance for a state to face. Neither property, justice or free institutions can remove it, but after twelve years of Democracy the evil grows. The state advances at other points. This is its progress since 1880 in all material directions, in all but the removal of the one thing by which states perish—the ignorance of voters.

Valuation	$158,587,495	$221,500,000
Cotton, bales	508,569	500,000
Sugar, hogsheads	218,314	350,000
Corn, bushels	9,906,183	19,327,923
Rice, pounds	23,188,311	69,930,831
Railroads, miles	652	1,391
New Orleans, manufacturing products	$18,808,000	$41,508,000

By this splendid showing of material progress we need only contrast the retrogression of the state in the ignorance of its voters. Here are comparative statistics compiled by Mr. Norman Walker, a journalist for whose accuracy and high professional position we can vouch from a long experience of his services as the New Orleans correspondent of The Press.

1888	122,955	126,939	49.2	50.8
1880	113,605	109,292	52.3	47.7

We put it to any thinking man, be he Democrat or Republican, can any progress, any advance be expected from a party under whose rule these things obtain? The state was seized under the plea of the necessity of protecting a superior civilization. What can be the result but utter and irremediable ruin when this power is used not to improve men but to add to material progress at the expense of all other interests?—Phil. Press.

A Changed Tune.

The New York Herald has been one of the most venomous opponents of the republican party during the present campaign. At the opening of the campaign the Herald surpassed even the mugwump organs in obsequious eulogy of Cleveland, and it was then confident, or gave every indication of being confident, of his re-election. But the Herald is a newspaper, even if it is an envenomed opponent of the republican party, and during recent days it betrays signs of weakening in its confidence as to democratic success. The Herald for weeks and months had steadfastly contradicted the current reports of a change of sentiment in New York adverse to Cleveland. At first it even ridiculed the notion that there was possibility of his defeat. But within a week there has been an obvious pulling in of its horns by the great Cleveland organ, and it is itself now giving some of the identical news which it had previously spent weeks in contradicting. The Herald is, indeed, covering the important political centers of New York with its own reporters, and their statements contain a good deal of matter which cannot but be regarded as significant under all the circumstances. The following dispatch, sent from Buffalo by a staff correspondent who had previously visited other points in the course of his investigation, is one of the series of dispatches which the Herald has printed and which is very good reading just now:

You can make up your mind that, unless some extraordinary change occurs between now and November 6, Harrison will go down to High Bridge with something like 70,000 plurality. If New York can overcome that Cleveland is all right; if not he will have to pack up and come back to Buffalo. You can get no idea in your present surroundings of the situation in the country. The republicans are making a fierce, intelligent and, so far, successful fight. It was a mistake for Cleveland to raise the tariff issue. I can see that now for the first time. The surface argument is, as you know, all in favor of the republicans, and that is the argument that catches the countrymen. There are large defections of lifelong democrats among farmers everywhere I have been. In Rochester the men in control of the democratic organizations will knife Cleveland sure. They are very bitter against him and in private make no bones of it. In Steuben county the democrats are all smashed up. Cleveland's appointees are a lot of milk-and-water jackanapes, who let their enemies scoop everything

Lewis Larson, a well known citizen of Wastedo, committed suicide by hanging himself in his barn. Temporary insanity is supposed to have been the cause.

There is considerable excitement in Ruthton, Pipestone county, over a coal find. The vein is about eighteen feet beneath the surface and was discovered by parties digging a well.

Work has been commenced on the convent of the Ursuline Sisters to be erected on the shore of Lake Pepin, near Frontenac, on ground donated by Gen. Isreal Garrard.

There were manufactured and burned at the kiln in Albert Lea 1,800,000 bricks during the past year. There were five kilns burned, the fuel used being mostly coal.

A Thirteen club is the style under which some society leaders at Brainerd have organized, casting defiance at the old tradition concerning the unlucky number.

Andrew Hermark of the town of Lisbon, Yellow Medicine county, had his right arm torn off in a threshing machine. He was taken to Montevideo for treatment. The chances are against his recovery.

Wheeler Bigarel, a farmer of Otter Tail county, was brought to Brown's Valley in charge of the sheriff and arraigned on a charge of offering counterfeit money for sale. He pleaded not guilty and the case was continued.

B. H. Purdy, dealer in family groceries at Howard Lake has made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, to A. P. Bull of the same village. The liabilities, though not large, is considerably in excess of the assets.

One of the most important events of the year in its relations to the interests of Luverne is a movement instituted for the organization of a local stock company for the operation of the Mound quarries. The movement is now so well under way that the organization is assured.

The Hall house at Albert Lea with all its furniture and fixtures, including 'bus line and four store buildings on Clark street and eight vacant lots on Main street, was sold by ex-Mayor Frank Hall to a syndicate consisting of Charles Kittleson of St. Paul, S. J. Bohnson, G. Gulbrandson and W. W. Bohnson of Albert Lea the consideration being $30,000.

In digging a well at Dodge Centre, for the Chicago, St. Paul and Kansas City railroad, when at a depth of twentyfive-feet, a test augur was used. After going five feet further water was forced through the hole four feet high. The company has been troubled for some time by a lack of water, and this may result in making Dodge Centre the end of a division, with shops and round house.

Foley Bros., railroad contractors of St. Cloud, have just closed a contract to build twenty miles of railroad for the Duluth and Winnipeg, from Duluth through the Indian reservation to Cloquet. They have also contracted to build a bridge for the Eastern Minnesota road 18,000 feet long across the bay from West Superior to Duluth, to be completed by the 20th of December.

Chief of Police Hayes, of Crookston who was shot by a tramp, is doing well and will probably recover. Both the bullets passed through him. Hayes had a very narrow escape, as the tramp fired twice after Hayes clutched and threw him. There were some 10 or a dozen people standing around, and the wonder is that no one else got hurt. The real name of the tramp cannot be ascertained. He will not be arrainged until Hayes is able to appear.

B. Hedding arrived at Long Prairie from St. Paul, accompanied by Miss Anna Dorfer, of Pomeroy, Ohio, his intended bride. The prospective groom is head of the firm of Hedding & Dettorman. So far as can be learned they are not married; but she comes with the understanding that she must look about for a few days and see how she likes her intended husband before she decides to wed him. The groom is a prosperous merchant and an honored citizen of Long Prairie, and though Miss Dorfer has come 1,000 miles to take as a husband a man she never met, she could have fared worse at home in nine cases out of ten. Mr. Hedding refuses to talk on the subject but it is the sensation of the hour.

At Elliottsville, Indiana, workmen were engaged in raising a large stone from the quarry, when one of the guy ropes slipped, and the stone fell with tremendous force upon George Johnston and William Aiken, mashing them out of all semblance to human beings.

The city of Cleveland, Ohio is bankrupt. There is about $450,000 belonging to the city deposited in a half dozen banks, but the bondsmen of Thomas Axworthy, the defaulting treasurer, have attached it and the result is the city is bankrupt. Kaufman Hayes, member of the council, has been placed in charge of the office, and will continue to act as treasurer until Axworthy's successor is elected. At present there is only $8,000 in the city's vaults, and when that is paid out the treasurer's office will be closed for financial repairs. It has been discovered that Axworthy arrived in Montreal on the night of the 30th of September from New York, and registered under his proper name at St. Lawrence hall. He left on Oct. 2, it is believed, by a Western Pacific train. While in Montreal he consulted Mr Geoffrinn, Q. C., who informed him that his offense was extraditable.

Before another issue of THE JOURNAL the verdict of the people will have been rendered at the ballot box and the fate of the country for four years decided. Clearly the position taken by the republican party, in the interest of the home and the people is by far the best one for the country and will no doubt prevail. There could be no doubt of it if the prohibition party was not in league with the democrats. Their position in this fight is a curious one. While professing to be fighting the liquor interests and desirous of annihilating that traffic their every action tends to help that business. The leaders claim that this is for the purpose of accomplishing the overthrow of the liquor interests—sometime in the future, say four or eight or twelve years. Meanwhile the liquor traffic, according to their theory must be allowed unrestrained action not even hampered by license. This is just what the liquor interests most desire, but is it the will of the people. Can any prohibitionist justify his vote to help the liquor interest on any practical grounds? Is it not for the best interests of the country to accept the help the republican party offers the temperance cause, even tho' you should claim that it is not all you desire. You certainly cannot deny that it is a step in the right direction and a long one and far better than to go backward by retaining the democratic party in power. We ask every honest, conscientious third party man to pause before he decides to vote just as the liquor interests desire him to and consider well the facts in the case. It is to vote the republican ticket and help their cause or the prohibition ticket and injure the cause he professes to love. If a vote for the third party was simply thrown away there would not be so much harm done, but it is not, it is a half vote for the sinful traffic you condemn. You cannot justify it upon the ground that if you keep on voting with the liquor interests for years by and by the republican party will turn in with you. If it is your duty to work for temperance principles it is your duty to accept every step made in that direction and aid it with your vote. You should join the republican party and help to shape their policy more fully to your notion for in this way only can you ever hope to do anything in the way of legislation. If you are sick of the way the liquor traffic uses you, absorbs the money that should be doing good in a hundred channels, in heavens' name why don't you vote to do the only good you can for the country NOW? Why wait until one-half the people are dead before you get to work. We do not expect that the leaders of the third party will use good common-sense in this crisis. They are too determined to sacrifice every principle of their party to their blind and bigoted hatred of the republican party, but to the rank and file, to those whose real sincere desire is to do the right thing, we turn with the request that they leave all prejudice behind and carefully consider the matter in all its bearings. Men are liable to error it is true but no man at this time can deliberately cast a half vote (even though it be) for the liquor interests and call it "error." The truth is too plain to be disguised. The only question is will you, with your eyes open, vote to help the liquor traffic? You will decide that question by your vote on Tuesday next.

Voters of the Third District.

A subject of great importance to the third district is the office of commissioner that is to be filled. The republicans have selected Mr. S. F. Markham, an old resident of the county and a thoroughly capable business man. Mr. Markham did not go about seeking the office before the convention and has not gone racing about the district asking for votes since, but his nomination was brought about by the recognition by his party of his peculiar fitness for the office through his well known business qualifications. All who are interested in having a wise and economical administration of county affairs will see to it that the name of S. F. Markham is on their ballot. A board, composed of such men as Mr. Markham, would be a credit to any county and we speak advisedly when we say that they would save a great deal of money for the taxpayers.

A Day of Reckoning.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

Mr. Canning, the democratic candidate for congress from the Fifth district, made a speech at Duluth the other day in which he uttered a most heartrending wail about the extortions of Minneapolis and the injustice suffered by Duluth in the matter of the handling of grain. He thought Duluth ought to have more wheat. It does seem as if she ought, but as long as prices continue to be higher in Minneapolis than in Duluth, the grain will probably continue to come here in spite of anything Mr. Canning may say about it. The very farmers who nominated Mr. Canning will continue to ship their grain here as long as it pays them better to send it here than it does to send it anywhere else. Duluth has no use for the grain, except to ship it again to New York, or England, or some other distant market. Minneapolis must have it for her mills. And so Minneapolis can afford to pay more for it than Duluth can, notwithstanding Duluth's boasted advantage on account of water transportation. Minneapolis is a home market; Duluth is, for all practical purposes, a foreign market. It is utterly powerles to exert any influence upon any other market. Minneapolis is in a very large sense independent of outside speculative markets. That is what benefits Mr. Canning's constituency, but Mr. Canning is fighting the home market idea with all his might. He wants his constituents to keep on selling in a distant market where they must compete with the world, instead of building up a market at home which they can control. He would have them oppose an increase of percentage of population in his district not engaged in agriculture, while the proportion of farmers increases and the competition between them grows fiercer. There will come a terrible day of reckoning for Mr. Canning and all who teach his doctrine.

Dissolving Views of the Presidency.

Nebraska State Journal: When the campaign newly opened, Cleveland's chance was rather fair, for he held the seat of office and the power that centers there, and the hosts that bore his banner seemed united, firm and strong, so the mark that showed his chances peradventure was this long:

But he wrote his little letter, which of platitudes was full, and which promised less to natives than it did to Johnny Bull, and it breathed so much the spirit of "Big I and little you," that the mark that showed his chances to this small dimension grew:

When the horny-handed toilers come to think the business o'er, they decided that they'd never vote for Cleveland any more; his election threatened ruin to the work that gave them food, so that little mark still dwindled till it something like this stood:

When the men who carried muskets in the crimson days of war had their little pensions vetoed by this presidential star, then they quietly decided that they'd work for his defeat, and that little mark kept shrinking in a way quite hard to beat:

As election day approaches, still that mark is getting small, and upon the fateful morning there will be no mark at all. Cleveland to be re-elected? Never will he know such bliss; even now his name is Dennis, and his chance not long as this:

The Pension Question.

A Ringing Presentation of the Issue from a Man Who Knows

The following extract is from an address delivered by General Harrison, at Danville, Ind., in Nov., 1887, months before he was nominated. It shows the true character of the man:

"Some national questions of interest turn upon the coming election. Soldiers, I believe that the question whether your fame and honor shall be exalted above the fame of those who fought against the flag, whether the rewards of your services shall be just and liberal, and the care of your disabled comrades ungrudging and ample, depends upon the election of a republican president in 1888.

For the first time in the history of the American nation we have had a president who, in dealing with the veto power, has used it not only to deny relief, but to impeach the reputations of the men who made it possible for him to be a president of the United States. The veto messages of Mr. Cleveland sent in during the last congress were, many of them, tipped with poisoned arrows. He vetoed what is called the Dependent Pension Bill. What is the principle of it?

I believe that the first bill introduced in congress embodying the principle of that bill was introduced by me. It was prepared in view of the fact that congress was being overwhelmed with private pension bills from men now disabled and unable to maintain themselves, who could not, by proof, connect their disability with their army service. I said, let us make the limitations of the pension law wide, and, instead of taking in these men one at a time, let us take the whole class in at once, and hence this bill. Some men sneered at it; said I was simply trying a buncombe game with the soldiers. But, gentlemen, the general principles of that bill have come to stay. It has, with slight modifications, received now the vote, almost unanimous, of the Grand Army of the Republic.

What is the principle of it? Why, it is something like the old rule we had in the army: as long as a man was able, he marched and carried his own gun and knapsack; but when he got hurt or sick, and fell out, we had an ambulance to put him in. And that is the principle embodied in this bill: that we, the survivors of the late war, as long as God gives us strength and health, will march in this column of civil life, making our own living, and carrying our own burden. But here is a comrade falling by the way, sickness, casualty—not his own fault—and he has to fall out; we want the great national ambulance to take him up.

That was the idea of this bill. Is it not just? Why, my countrymen, somebody must care for these veterans who stood up amid shot and shell and sabre stroke, but cannot trace their infirmities to their army services by any satisfactory proof. They have fought manfully since. They are dependent on their work for a living and they cannot work. Somebody must take care of them; the expense cannot be avoided unless you kick the old veterans out and let them die on the roadside.

Somebody must care for them and the simple question is, shall they be cared for as paupers in the county poorhouses, or shall the great nation they served and saved care for them as soldiers? I prefer the latter. I want to maintain that man's memory of the fact that he was a soldier; I want the generations coming on to know that it is safe to abandon civil pursuits, throw wealth behind you and yourself into the bloody conflict of the nation's life; that republics are grateful, and that its soldiers shall be taken care of.

Oh, they say we are so greedy. Why, gentlemen, this was not a greedy army that went out to maintain the supremacy of the law and the constitution and the glory of the flag. They were mercenary stayed at home. There was the place to make money.

I shall never forget that transcendent day when Sherman's army, that had entered the Confederacy at the gate of Louisville, and marked its bloody pathway by Vicksburg, and Chattanooga, and Missionary Ridge, and Atlanta, and Bentonville, and Raleigh, to the national capital, marched in parade up that magnificent avenue. It was lined on either hand with a great mass of men and women that had come to look upon these boys who had suffered and achieved so much.

Ah! it was a proud day. There was not a soldier that marched that street that glad, bright morning who was not paid over and over again for all his toil and suffering by the glad acclaim that welcomed him. The left of the column was in the shadow of those magnificent columns that support the porticos of the national treasury; and yet in all that moving mass there was not one hungry eye turned toward the coffers of the republic; not one. If we had been hungry for gold, I do not know any power in the universe that could have prevented us that day from emptying those vaults into our own pockets.

Not so. Those men were not thinking of money. Their hearts ran forward faster than the quick time of their march to the homes here in Hendricks County, and through these northern states, where loved ones waited to welcome them. For, thank God! it was the glory and strength of our American army that there was not a soldier in it who did not have some humble place that he called home, who did not have a chair by some fireside waiting for him, and some arms of love to embrace him when he came. That is what saved the country. That is what made it possible to disband such a great army without any disturbance in any part of the land."

How to Build up the Republicn Party

Duluth Tribune: A strong and substantial building cannot be erected unless it have a good, strong, soled foundation. Nether can a political party. A strong party cannot be built up in the nation unless such party is strong in its state and county organizations. Some republicans say, "Oh, I am a republican as to national politics, but in the selection of county officers I always vote for the best man, or for the one I like the best."

This is not the way, however, to build up the republican party. The way to build up a strong republican party in this nation is to build up a strong republican party in the various states and in the various counties composing the states. This cannot be done by voting for a portion of the candidates on the democratic ticket. If the nominees of the republican party are reputable and capable men, the way in which republicans can best sustain and build up that party and give it a strong and substantial foundation, is by supporting its nominees from the first named on the ticket to the last.

Warren Sheaf: Hon. S. G. Comstock is known to be the most powerful legislator in the State of Minnesota. This fact is acknowledged by all, without regard to party. During the time that Mr. Comstock was state senator from this district and directly after the hail storm in this county, a bill was introduced for assistance to the hail sufferers, during Mr. Comstock's absence, and was indefinitely postponed. When he came into the senate and found the condition of the bill he revived it and succeeded in making it a law, thereby giving to the farmers who lost their crops a benefit which should never be forgotten. Now it does seem that any man who can appreciate a favor should remember this and return the compliment by giving Mr. Comstock his vote this fall.

A Whole Temperance sermon.

The following story is told of General Harrison in connection with a public dinner given him on one occasion: "At the close of the dinner one of the gentlemen drank his health. The General pledged his toast by drinking water. Another gentleman offered a toast and said: 'General, will you not favor me by taking a glass of wine? The General, in a very gentlemanly way, begged to be excused. He was again urged to join in a glass of wine. This was too much. He rose from his seat and said, in the most dignified manner: 'Gentlemen, I have twice refused to partake of the wine-cup; I hope that will be sfficient. Though you press the matter ever so much, not a drop shall pass my lips. I made a resolve when I started in life that I would avoid strong drink. That vow I have never broken. I am one of a class of young men who graduated together. Sixteen members of my class now fill drunkard's graves, and all from the pernicious habit of wine-drinking. I owe my health, my happiness and prosperity to the resolution."—[Zion's Herald.

Juggling With the People's Money.

From Mr. Blaine's Chicago Speech.

When Mr. Manning retired from Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet Mr. Jordan resigned from the office of treasurer, the two gentlemen established a bank in the city of New York and the administration of Mr. Cleveland loaned them Government funds without interest as a fixed and permanent deposit $1,100,000 of the people's money. In the days of Louis Napoleon's most absolute power, if he had given five and one-half million francs out of the public purse to two friends as an aid to a private enterprise in banking, the barricades would have been across the streets of Paris and a revolution inaugurated against the government that could indulge in a favoritism so ruinous. If Queen Victoria should request of the English Treasury that the same amount should be issued to two of her personal friends as an aid to a speculative venture in banking, the ministry would have made an inquiry into the soundness of her Majesty's mind upon a proposition so extraordinary. And yet Mr. Fairchild, acting for the President, ordered $1,100,000 of the people's money to be placed in the bank of Messrs. Manning & Jordan, and authorized the bank to "hold that sum as a fixed balance." I quote the secretary's exact language. It has been there now for more than a year and will probably remain there for many years more if the democratic party retain the power to abuse their trusteeship of the people's money for a private purpose.

In the editorial sanctums of the Boston Herald, New York Times, New York Post, New York Commercial-Advertiser, and every leading democratic newspaper in the land, there is an editor charged with the special duty of critically dissecting every speech made by General Harrison, in the hope that some "blunder" can be found in them, that can be used against him, and against the republican party. These men have worked hard and they are skilled workmen. What have they found? Well, that's just what those who pay their salaries would like to know.

From every section of the country comes expressions of approval of Gen. Harrison as a candidate and as a statesman. There isn't the slightest indication of republication defection—not the slightest. Such a condition of things is almost unprecedented.

A Positive Hindrance.

What has the third party ever done for temperance? It has been in existence nearly twenty years. Before its birth sixteen States had enacted prohibitory legislation, and since that period —1869—fifteen additional States have enacted stringent laws against rum, in most cases unaided by, and in many cases in spite of, the prohibition party. From the day of its advent till now, it has been a positive hindrance to the cause of prohibition by playing more or less directly into the hands of the avowed rum party of the country. But its power to execute this mischief has reached high-water mark and is now on the wane.

Prohibition in the guise of a third political party is a sham. Prohibitory legislation owes its existence and success to the republican party. That party is the tower of its defence and its hope for the future. The sooner the advocates of third-partyism recognize this fact and in good faith strike hands with the only party of progress and reform, the sooner and more completely will triumph come to the cause they claim to love so well.

Irish-American Drift.

Thomas F. Ryan is one of the most prominent of Irish-American citizens of Indianapolis. He is a democrat of thirty years standing, but came over this year on account of the tariff. He says he knows of many changes like his own in Indiana, and adds: "In this campaign twice as many Irish-Americans will vote the republican ticket as have ever voted it before. I have been among our people. I know them and I have talked with them. They are deeply interested in this free trade question—more than they ever have been in any other political question that has come up in this country. They are reading on the subject—those to whom free trade is only a theory—but many of them know personally, from experience abroad, what effect free trade has on the question of wages.

"The Irishmen who left the old country to come here, left because they could not make a living there; and now that they have adopted the life and custom of this country, have become citizens here, they don't want to see established in this country the conditions which made it impossible for them to live decently—in many cases to live at all—in the old country.

"Against such condition they will vote solidly, as far as they are sufficiently informed to understand them. Our people, as a class, are far more intelligent than they used to be. Those who were originally ignorant, after living here for some time, have gained considerable intelligence by association with the people here. Their sons and daughters have enjoyed the advantages of the American schools and have inter-married with the native Americans. They feel that they are now American themselves. They are patriotic, and will stand up for this country in which are all their interests."

One of the most significant features of the campaign is the general enthusiasm among the ladies for the republican ticket. Women have always been on the right side of all questions, and their moral aid in this campaign is most encouraging to republican. The democratic free trade policy is a threat to supersede the American home by the European peasant's hovel. The home is woman's empire, and no wonder that she is doing all in her power to renel invasion.

An Ohio journal objects to General Harrison because, it alleges his grandfather to have been a slave-owner. Yet the same journal defends every southern democrat in and out of Congress. Some people regard consistency as a jewel others do not.

The democrats are much annoyed over Harrison's "stumping of the country by telegraph." Why, bless their souls, their troubles are only just beginning.

Individual enthusiasm is an excellent thing. It is the enthusiastic people who lead. Hitch your political enthusiasm to the party organization in your district and so make it count. There's nothing like an organized army of enthusiasts.

Gilman's Speech.

The democrats are crowing a great deal over Gilman's speech at St. Cloud Monday night. If the charges Mr. Gilman brings were true and Mr. Gilman is as he claims an honest republican it was a duty he owed his party to have brought them out long ago and not wait till the last minute. Knowing them (as he says he does) full well long ago he says that he had made up his mind to keep still about it and would have done so had not the Tribune attacked him. This proves his charges against Merriam to be of a purely personal nature and destroys their effect. Because he could not secure the nomination himself he hopes to defeat Mr. Merriam. We understand that Mr. Nelson does not endorse Mr. Gilman's peculiar views.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

Blaine on Trusts

Evening Herald: Nearly fifty thousand people greeted Hon. James G. Blaine at Goshen, Indiana, yesterday. His remarks were principally on trusts and when he had completed, the now presiding officer of these United States was completely squelched. He unmercifully scored President Cleveland for his action in relation to trusts, and closed his speech with the following sensational statement.

"When President Cleveland penned his message he knew that one of the largest trusts ever organized in the world (the sugar trust) was in full operation, and that if the protective tariff was healthful to that trust, he was giving it all the aid, both official and personal, in his power. Nor was Mr. Cleveland's silence the only boon which the sugar trust received. When the Mills bill was under consideration, the president of the sugar trust (Mr. Havemeyer), a well known active democrat, of New York, appeared before the ways and means committtee, and according to statement made in open senate by Mr. Allison of Iowa, obtained such an arrangemten of duty as was equivalent to $6,000,000 in the pocket of the trust.

Duluth Herald: John L. Gibbs, who is the redeeming feature of Gov. McGill's railroad and warehouse commission, gave the farmers of St Hilaire some sensible advice on the subject of divarsified farming, Tuesday night. He said: "If a farmer would thrive anywhere he must become a thinking man, and so arrange his work as to give employment to himself and family twelve months in the year. No business will thrive where the workers are idle one half of the time, and least of all farming. Diversified farming builds good houses, large barns, gives the farmer read money, and changes the face of the whole country, always for the better. This necessitates a home market, at our very doors where the farmer can sell his horses, his beef, his pork, his butter, his milk, his chickens and his eggs." How much there is in these few words, but if American industries are to be destroyed, as they certainly will be if the Democrutib policy is carried out, where will the farmer find his market? Certainly not at home, and but a small per cent, of his product can be market abroad. The home market is always the best. Build it up and the product of the farm will never fail to bring good prices. It can be built up only by the American system of protection.

Harrison: He Wears Well.

From not one section of this broad land does there come the slightest dissatisfaction with the national republican ticket, or with the principles upon which it stands. Just think of this condition a moment. Perhaps, though, if you aren't busy, you better think of it more than a moment, for it is rare that such a condition obtains to be thought about. It is an omen of success not to be lightly considered. Not since Lincoln ran the second time has there been such unanimity among republicans. You remember the result then?

One of the strongest reasons why things are now as they are is the peculiar availibility of General Harrison as the head of the ticket. The New York delegation at Chicago discovered this fact when it came unanimously to his support. Indiana knew it all the time. The Pacific cost learned it within a day after the Chicago convention adjourned. The entire country has been fully convinced of it ever since it got acquainted with the republican candidate. No man ever came suddenly into overwhelming prominence and wore so well.

What did the country discover in General Harrison? It discovered:

1. A man whose training had wonderfully well fitted him for executive work.

2. A man who is himself the best possible representative of the progressive American.

3. A man whose public and private life consistently bear out his firm, but always modest Christian profession.

4. A man who believes in constitutional protectien, not simply for the sake of protection, but for the sake of American workingmen.

5. A man who is not a demagogue in his heartfelt interest in the laboring classes, for he has always been a poor man, is a poor man to-day, and has always worked hard for a modest living.

6. A man who has the backbone to be his own boss.

7. A man who will be a real civil service reformer, not a sham one, because he says he will be—and Benjamin Harrison's word is where the republican party has put United States bonds—above suspicion.

It is no wonder the republicans are united on such a man. Nor is it any wonder that they have drawn to their side thousands who have not hitherto acted with them. Harrison: he wears well.

Chisago County News. Mr. Merriam will surely poll the full party vote in this county this fall. Our people like to vote for an honest man if he is a banker. They like to vote for a man of energy too and one who has stood by the farmer in many ways in the past, and these are two attributes Mr. Merriam has.

Prohibition Methods.

Duluth Tribune.

The state exchanges are almost unanimous in their report of the campaign methods employd by the Minnesota Prohibitionists. In every portion of the state they assail only the republican party, the republican platform, and republican candidates!

Reports of the canvass elsewhere show that the same methods have been adopted by the Prohibitionists in all the northern states, especially in the four doubtful ones!

Four years ago the prohibition party secured the success of the democratic national ticket by methods less open, and therefore more effective, than those now so generally adopted?

Four years ago thousands of men voted the Prohibition ticket with the honest purpose of promoting the prohibition cause?

Then, although the Prohibition party was being secretly betrayed by its leaders into the hands of the democrats, its open declaration of principles was an avowed hostility to both the democratic and republican parties!

This year the declared doctrines and purposes of the Prohibition party are totally different!

This year it declares, in its national platform of principles, that it is open and steadfast ally of the democratic party and the open and uncompromising enemy of the republican party!

It takes a position on the tariff question which is all that the most fanatical free trader could desire!

Henry George could not have pronounced himself more strongly in favor of free trade than did the Prohibitionists when they declared in favor of removing the tariff not only from the necessities, but also from the comforts of life!

Naturally enough, a party which make solemn, public profession of faith in free trade, so extreme as this, must also make open war upon the republican party, which is opposed to free trade!

Naturally enough, a party which declares itself so open and determined a foe to a protective tariff is the ally and political consort of democratic!

Nturally enough, no one but an out and out free trader can vote the Prohibition ticket without stultifying himself!

Naturally enough, the results upon the national and state tickets everywhere must be a division of the free trade vote and solidification of the protective vote!

There is no other logical solution of the question as to what effect the Prohibition ticket will have upon the coming election.

The tariff question is the all-absorbing one.

Four years ago the Prohibitionists elected Cleveland.

This year they will elect Harrison by dividing the vote which is against protection.

The wonder is that such natual free trade allies as the democrats and prohibitionists have not united on one ticket.

Is it not the withdrawal of Fisk in favor of Cleveland one of the sensations which prominent democrats have threatened to spring upon the country?

Every Prohibitionist who belives in the tariff plank of his party platform would be in honor bound to vote for Cleveland in case of the withdrawal of Fisk.

If the estimate of competent judges is not sadly at fault, even this dernier resort will not save the democrats from defeat.

The prospects now are that in New York, alone, the republican vote will be greater than that of the democrats and Prohibitonists combined.

Inconsistent Republicans

Moorhead News: The point we desire particularly to make at this time is the inconsistency of men who denounce Merriam, and are mad because Scheffer was not nominated. Scheffer is a wealthy banker as well as Merriam, and there is just as good ground for believing that money was used in his interest although unsuccessful, as in Mr. Merriam's. Besides his being a wealthy banker, Mr. Scheffer's political record is inconsistent, changeable and erratic, and not always loyal to the republican party, while that of Mr. Merriam is consistent, unvarying and loyal to the republican party.

In the Fifth District

Special to the Dispatch:

HALLOCK, Minn. Oct. 22.—There was a rousing republican rally here on Saturday night last, which has furnished the topic of conversation since. There was a torchlight procession, music and speeches by Senator Comstock, John L. Gibbs and Ignatius Donnelly, and it was the last named gentleman, in his usual happy vein, who gave some good reasons why the voters of the Fifth district should cast their votes for Comstock. He said: "I was in the Merchants hotel one day last week talking with a gentleman whom I had casually met, who told me that he would like to see Comstock elected, and being asked for an especially good reason said that some eighteen years ago Comstock had been working for him chopping wood in the pine lands of Minnesota all winter, and when he paid him his money in the spring Comstock remarked to him that he was going to put that money with that which he had already saved and educate himself, and like another man who became great, who started in life as a woodchopper in Illinois, Abraham Lincoln, hoped to cut some figure in the history of his country." The several references made to Comstock by Donnelly were cheeredto the echo.

A Dangerous Constitutional Amendment.

Duluth Tribune:

We heartily say amen to the following extract from an editorial in the Pioneer Press of the 20th inst. relative to the constitutional amendments to be voted upon at the coming election: "The second amendment proposed is a far more serious matter. It deals with the subject of exemptions from seizure and sale in discharge of debt, and reads as follows:

Provided, however, that all property so exempted shall be liable to seizure and sale for any debts incurred to any person for work done or materials furnished in the construction, repair or improvement of the same. And provided further, that such liability to seizure and sale shall be also extended to all real property, for any debt incurred to any laborer or servant for labor or service performed.

Doubtless the idea of the legislature, in framing this section, was to prevent fraud and facilitate the collection of moneys due. But the method selected is one that would utterly destroy those beneficent provisions of the law by which the creditor is forbidden to strip his debtor mercilessly and cast him helpless on the world. As far as the artisan is concerned, any good mechanic's lien law is a fair protection. Let us see what the adoption of this amendment would involve. The exemption from seizure and sale for dept in this state includes a homestead of not exceeding eighty acres in the country, or a single lot in the city, with the dwelling thereon, a reasonable amount of furniture and all wearing apparel, stock enough to furnish a small farm, and seed grain, provisions for one year, the tools of the mechanic, wages of the laboring man or woman not to exceed $50, and a number of minor articles. That these could he retained when adversity was most cruel is the secret of much of the prosperity of our people. And all this would be changed by the adoption of the proposed amendment. If a poor woman were ill enough to require a nurse, and were unable immediately upon recovery to pay the wages charged, her sewing machine could be seized and carried away. The mechanic who has his little home is now sure, under misfortune, of retaining that, of the implements that are his stock in trade, and of wages to the amount of $50. Agree to the amendment, and all may be sold by summary process. Or take the case of the farmer. He has, we will say, employed field help this year, whose wages were to be paid from the sales of grain. Suddenly the frost came, and he is left not only without the where-withal to pay, but without sufficient means of subsistence. As the law now stands, his holding is protected, and he may make up next year for the losses of this. Adopt the amendment, and his farm, his stock, everything that he has in the world must go instantly in payment of the overdue wages. It would be a return to the cruelty of the ancient systems, when none but the creditor had a voice in making the laws. It would take away the safeguards now guaranteed to the farmer, the artisan, the laboring man and woman, and leave them naked to a pitiless world. Such an amendment, however innocent or beneficent in intent, should be buried out of sight by the people of Minnesota."

Both the republican and the democratic county committees in this county, in ordering tickets printed, should be careful to have them all printed with a great big "no" to this amendment.

A Lynn, Mass., shoemaker and a representative and thoughtful workingman, who has just returned from a brief summer trip to Europe—whoever heard of a European workingman taking a summer trip to America?—puts the situation bluntly thus: "It is a question of simple business. Do we want to risk fifty cents a day? That's all there is to it. Low wages, besides, means low living. It means poverty and it means ignorance; and these two things put man at the foot of the ladder, and there he will stay. No European workingman, with his free trade and his low wages, thinks of getting up in the world. Who ever saw workingmen in Europe filling offices, or their wives and daughters in society, or themselves respected and honored? Nobody."

Synopsis of Proposed Constitutional Amendments, prepared By the Attorney General, pursuant to Chapter 157, of General Laws of 1887.

The Legislature of 1887 provided for submitting certain amendments to the State Constitution, to be submitted at the general election to be held in 1888.

The proposed amendments to the provisions of the Constitution to be effected thereby are as follows:

Chapter 1, of the General Laws of 1887, provides the following amendment to Article 4 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that the said article be amended by adding thereto the following additional section, to be numbered as Section 35: "Sec. 35. Any combination of persons either as individuals or as members or officers of any corporation to monopolize the markets for food products in this State, or to interfere with or restrict the freedom of such markets, is hereby declared to be a criminal conspiracy, and shall be punished in such manner as the Legislature shall provide."

The ballots to be used in voting upon this Amendment shall be as follows: First, ballots in favor of the amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to freedom of markets—Yes." Second, ballots used against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the words: "Amendment to article 4 of the Constitution, by adding thereto a new section in relation to the freedom of markets—No."

Article 4 of the Constitution, of which the above section is proposed as an amendment comprises the constitutional provisions relating to the legislative department of the State, and at present contains no provision relating to combinations sought to be prohibited by the proposed amendment.

Section 12 of Article 1 of the State Constitution now reads as follows: "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in this State, but this shall not prevent the Legislature from providing for imprisonment or holding to bail persons charged with fraud in contracting said debt, and a reasonable amount of property shall be exempt from seizure and sale for the payment of any debt or liability. The amount of such exemption shall be determined by law."

It is proposed to amend this as follows: Chapter 2 of the General Laws of 1887 provides that the following amendment to Section 12 of Article 1, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota be proposed to the voters of this State at the next general election, to-wit: "Provided, however, that all property so exempted shall be liable to seizure and sale for any debts incurred to any person for work done or material furnished in the construction, repair or improvement of the same. And, provided further, that such liability to seizure and sale shall also extend to all real property for any debt incurred to any laborer or servant for labor or service performed."

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State for protection of the rights of working men or women—Yes." The ballots to be used in voting against such amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "Amendment to Section 12 of Article 1 of the Constitution of this State, for protection of the rights of working men or women—No."

The effect of this amendment will be to render all property liable for debts incurred for work done or materials furnished in the construction, improvement or repair of such property.

Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, now reads as follows: "SECTION 1. Legislature, Session. The Legislature of the State shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, and shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law, and no session shall exceed the term of sixty days."

It is proposed to amend this section as follows: Chapter 3 of the General Laws of the State of Minnesota of 1887, provides that the following amendment to Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota, be proposed to the people of said State at the next general election, that is to say, that said section shall be amended so as to read as follows: "SECTION 1. The Legislature shall consist of the Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet biennially at the seat of government of the State at such times as shall be prescribed by law, but no session shall exceed the term of ninety legislative days, and no new bill shall be introduced in either branch, except on the written request of the Governor, during the last twenty days of such session, except the attention of the Legislature shall be called to some matter of general interest by a special message of the Governor."

The ballots to be used in voting in favor of this amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—Yes," and ballots to be used in voting against said amendment shall have written or printed or partly written and partly printed thereon the following words: "For the amendment of Section 1 of Article 4, of the Constitution of this State, providing for biennial sessions of the Legislature—No."

The Constitution at present provides for biennial sessions, and the effect of this last amendment will be to continue biennial sessions, but instead of such sessions being limited to sixty days, as they are now, they would be limited to ninety days, and no bill could be introduced during the last twenty days except as provided for in such amendment.

Dated July 1st, 1888.

[25-33] MOSES E. CLAPP, Attorney General.

Something to Think About.

Kittson County Enterprise: The Enterprise has always advocated the theory of diversified farming and never has the truth dawned upon the people of the Red River valley more fully than this season. Farmers who have not been looking ahead, have raised wheat only, and now that the crop is comparatively a failure, what have they to resort to? The farmer who can today say, I have no wheat, but then I am lucky in having fifty or seventy-five hogs that will soon be ready for market, after they have been fed on our poor wheat this year, or has a herd of fat steers to place on the market, that man is all right. If he has a choice lot of steers, you can bet that man has a high grade of cows that he is making money from, either by making butter or cheese. A copy of Hoard's Dairyman is before us and an article which we clip from said paper, is so much of our ideas, we publish it in full. "Get out of the deep worn rut of your old prejudices. Stand up and look the problem of better success square in the face, like a man of pluck and brains.

Don't whine about monopolies as long as you don't do anything for yourself on your farm. Monopolies are bad enough. Corrupt officials are bad enough. High taxes are bad enough, the Lord knows, but to sink down in indifference in side of your own line fence, and call every improvement that is urged upon you "theory," is a thousand times worse on your fortune.

With such a spirit no wonder monopolies grind you. Think of a farmer trying to make money by taking milk to a cheese factory from a lot of cows that yield him only 3,000 pounds of milk per year, and he not knowing or caring anything about improving that yield by breeding better dairy blood. Think of him going along, year in and year out, and not knowing how to feed a good cow, even if he has one, so as to bring a little profit for his hard labor. Think of him making butter that costs him every bit of 16 to 18 cents a pound for groceries at a country store paying high for the groceries, and getting but little for his butter. Think of him selling cream to the creamery and never stopping to think, study or read an hour in a month as to the kind of cows he ought to have for that business, or the proper way to care for them in order to get the most cream.

Think of a man blindly plunging along in these old ruts of farm practice for years, never caring to read what other men are doing who are successful and make money in the dairy business.

Think of a man doing all these things, as thousands are doing, and not caring enough for his own profit to invest barely 100 cents a year for a dairy paper that is wide awake to his best interests all the time, and worth each week a hundred times its cost. Think of a man doing all these things and then blaming the railroad, the monopolies, and the tariff for his bad fortune; not once dreaming he himself is mostly to blame, because he cares so little for knowledge and the experience of others when it can be had so cheaply. Then think how foolish it is to say that a paper that is trying to build up practical success on the farm and enlarge the power of the farmer to help himself, is not a true friend to the farmer because it is not everlastingly howling about monopolies. Remember success, like charity, "begins at home."

Profitable Feeding Capacity of Dairy of Dairy Cows.

Jersey Bulletin.

It is of the highest importance to the dairyman that a thorough test, not only of the milk and butter ability of his cows be made, but that their feeding capacity be known as well, that he may determine with some degree of certainty to what extent they may be profitably fed for dairy work in order that he may reap the very best returns for his investment and his labor. By no plan except by separate and individual experiments can this knowledge be gained with entire accuracy. Each animal must be tested separately, and those only should be retained that prove themselves competent to convert a paying amount of proper food into milk to constitute them of value to his interest. There is a class of dairy cows, and it is a pretty large one, that is blessed with good appetites, and to a certain point the food consumed is converted profitably into milk, but beyond this it is diverted into the formation of flesh; when this point is reached the feeding for dairy returns is done at a loss. There are others again that are specially constituted by nature to return in milk value the bulk of all the food except that required to sustain the animal system in thrifty condition, and results are not changed by increasing the food. This is the true type of a good dairy animal. As soon as the drain upon the system of a cow of this kind ceases by the stopping of the milk flow either from natural causes or by intentionally drying her off, the increase of flesh will be noticed and she will fatten very readily. This is demonstrated in the experience of every Jersey breeder as well as of those who have studied the habits of other breeds of cattle devoted to dairy uses. The principles and effects are the same, and whether the milk flow be large or is more concentrated in richness and quality, the cow especially adapted to returning the highest results in the particular direction for which she is intended will not lay on flesh during the time she is giving milk, no matter to what extent she may be fed or what may be the nature of her food. This fact has been forcibly illustrated in the high feeding for butter tests made with many of the notable animals of the Jersey breed, the increase of butter or milk invariably has followed increased food and no appreciable addition of flesh was discerned. If this subject was given more prominence by breeders of pure bred dairy cattle and the ability to consume food profitably, made a leading feature in breeding animals, and as much importance given to it as is now attached to families and strains, very soon half the uncertainties in selecting a good dairy cow would be avoided. A few generations of judicious mating of animals known to be profitable dairy feeders, would fix a type that would prove of far greater value to the dairy interests of the country than can possibly arise from the use of animals chosen simply because of their near or remote relationship to some great dam or sire that has a long list of alleged butter makers or large milk producers to their credit, and for which high pices are often paid, this consideration alone being the principle attraction. Not that it would be wise to deprecate the great importance of perpetuating the blood of animals that have proved themselves potent in transmitting to their progeny valuable dairy ability; this is of vast importance and it is believed to be one of the safest guides to breeding. The old adage that "like begets like" is true and is generally reliable, but still greater value will be added to the noted families when it becomes the custom to encourage and cultivate the inclination to convert the greatest amount of food into the most profitable returns, and to breed out traits that have a tendency for forming surplus flesh. These may have a pleasing effect to the eye, but a flesh-forming cow during her milking term is unprofitable in the dairy, and no matter how royal her lineage may be, she is not to be depended upon as a reliable breeder of profitable dairy stock.

Practical Stock Growers.

The Farmer.

The successful business men' as a rule, are practical. Especially is this true of stock breeders on the average farm. Such a breeder foresees, to a great extent, the advantages (and difficulties as well) in the course he would follow. He is conservative, in a limited measure, in his expectations; but sanguine in pursuit of his purpose. His forethought enables him to guard against many items of loss, and the habit of anticipation grows with his continued application of thought and energy. He must be a thinker and needs also to be ever on the alert. A practical idea is sometimes entertained only in theory. when it might be the very life blood of a successful business if the details of its consummation were rightly followed out. The farmer who simply wishes he were able to grow good stock so as to secure good prices, and thus do business at a handsome profit, is a victim of this theory, if he neglects to devote his knowledge to this purpose.

But the practical man adopts the idea that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well. He begins at once to carry out a plan. He grows half-blood youngsters from his inferior stock this year, even if he finds it necessary to sell a good per cent of the young or parent stock to pay for blooded sires or service fees. His foresight assures him that two of the three half-blood draft colts (if one goes to pay service fees) will bring him more money as four year old horses then three inferior ones would bring. If his farm is half paid for he finds no difficulty in getting credit for twelve months, if he wishes to buy a sire in the cattle or swine department of his business, provided he has a half dozen or more females for foundation, in one or both varieties of stock. Within the twelve months' he is able to dispose of enough of the stock to pay for the sires, and still retain enough (in value) to be worth, at once, much more than the original unimproved animals. Then with the coming generations when he has three-fourths and seven-eights blooded stock in his yards he realizes that his original investments for improved sire's or services of same, have been returned to him many fold.

But the selection of a herd with which to start a breeding business requires more than simply a desire to have some good live stock on the farm. One without experience needs the aid of an honest "practical" stockman of extensive and successful experience (not necessarly one who has great wealth, for the man with great wealth, sometimes makes it in other ways than from attention to live stock) in a special variety of farm stock. Such an adviser will guard him against ill-form, poor constitution, (and other defects) in animals. The novice will learn from such a friend, that "quality" is a valuable part of the composition of breeding animals of every sort. These and a dozen other things, he will learn from the practical man, add much to the market value of one animal as compared with another, which to inexperienced "eyes and touch" seems even the better of the two. He is admonished farther' in his course of practical studies, not to expect style or action in a beef or dairy animal (of the right sort) in a great degree, nor that the absence of these qualities in a horse is of no consequence.

The "practical" man, in the stock business, until he is an advanced age at least, will always be a student. He will, as a rule, know more than he is conscious of. He will be a zealous, modest seeker for light and truth. He will be a reader and as much an observer of the every day phenomena of his environments. He will realize, too, later on, that "a wise questioning" of others (and of his own conclusions) has been the half of his knowledge.

Make Money in Pork.

The Farmer.

The pork product for 1889 can not, at best be very large, of course, prices will continue good, though the average rate will hardly equal that of 1888, on account of the great supply of corn. Last spring many farmers were unable to grow any considerable number of pigs' not only on account of the scarcity of corn, but because of the cholera, or other disease prevalent in some regions. The supply is now very short, and must be until November of next year. The question is, what is the farmer's best course to pursue in breeding for next season's market. The general opinion of the most successful swine breeders, those who grow for the pork market, is that the earlier the Spring pigs can be safely secured, the surer will one be of the top prices for them, as early matured pork. With plans arranged now, and with the brood sows secured, and feed and pasture provided for, farmers South of latitude 38 degree may meet the early market by starting now "from the bottom." If one breeds a dozen good sows at once, wherever the climate is not unfavorable for pigs on the first of March, and with judicious management the product, say 50 pigs, will go into market within 12 months from the first of November, as 10,000 lbs choice pork, at least.

If one has rye sown, so that it can be used in part as pasture during April and May, and then use clover pasture, or if the clover supply is limited, use oats sown for the purpose, a good share of the food for their dams and their young litters will be provided. The rye, if pastured aright will still yield a good crop of grain, suitable for feeding in the sheaf after the middle of June, or the first of July; or when threshed, it will make a principle part of excellent slop for the pigs when mixed with bran, oats, or shelled corn. For additional food, the new corn in "roasting ears" helps the pigs when half way on in their journey to an early market, and as it hardens, it will be a valuable part in pushing to early development and heavy weight. Many farmers, even 200 miles North of the "thirty-eight degree line" will put seven-month old shoats into market at an average of over 200 pounds weight before the close of the present month of October.

Every convenience for breeding and farrowing must be provided in the higher latitudes. The progressive, wide-awake farmer can comply with most of the conditions briefly outlined above. The larger his present supply of old corn, the better. The "rustlers" will put some six-months old pigs in market at 180 to 200 lbs., as early as the middle of next August, though to do this they will need extraordinary advantage. The earlier the Spring pigs can be got to market, of proper weight, the surer the good prices, as a rule. But care must be exercised that the pigs are not only secured, but properly nurtured through the first six weeks. Conditions of profitable pork production are: Time of breeding, care and food, including range and water, and the securing of a market when there is the smallest number on sale—provided always that good blood is derived from both sires and dams.

Farmers in the timber belt along the new B. & N. W. line could make a good thing sending a few carloads of woods to this market just now. If they have no dry wood but have ash or oak to cut that would do nearly as well. "The early bird catches the worm" in this case and the first wood received will bring the best price.

Dr. A. Nelson was up from Fertile last week interviewing old friends and enjoying the pleasures of city life for awhile. He reports the prospects for business very fair considering the losses sustained by the farmers from the blight. The doctor reports his own business good which does not surprise us knowing, as we do, that when there is any necessity for a physician's services a good one always gets the business.

My goods are wide open to all to inspect my immense lines of jewelry, silverware, fancy goods, Florentine statuary, etc, and if you do not buy, you will still have conferred a favor upon me by your greeting. C. H. SAAKE.

A rabid probib says: "I am glad that Gen. Harrison is elected instead of Cleveland as we are now sure of a good, clean able administration, and the interests of the country are now safe !" And yet this very same man voted for Cleveland via the third party ticket, preached the third party dogmas and worked to the extent of his influence for the success of the third party ticket. Oh! consistency, thou art a jewel.

A TRIP TO WHATCOM, W. T.

Observations of An Outling Who Made the Trip.

THE PASSAGE AMONG THE ISLANDS—INTO THE LOWER STRAITS OF GEORGIA—THE CITY OF WHATCOM AND ADJOINING LINKS OF FUTURE CITIES—INCOMPARABLE SCENERY OF THE SAN JUAN ISLANDS AND SURROUNDING MOUNTAINS.

Departing from Port Townsend on the good, staunch ocean tug, "Ranier," at one o'clock p. m., adown among the San Juan islands in the beautiful sunlight and refreshing breeze of the early October afternoon.

Leaving the harbor of Port Townsend, a port of entry on the North Pacific, a semi-circular course is made until we reach Pt. Wilson, where the United States government have erected a light house and other buildings. It is from this point the dividing line between Admiralty Inlet and the San Juan is drawn. Continuing from this last named government station, the voyage is directed through the pulsing waters of the San Juan; afar off you see the tidal wave returning from out the inlet, beyond, down the Straits of Fuca, ships, vessels of the sea, are seen coming into the port of entry with spread canvass upon their yards, from the main to the topgallant. On the right we have Widby Island, with its high sand banks. Plowing through the waters, Blunt's Island is passed. It is a small, high island, with a government plant and light house upon it. In the distance we see San Juan and Lopez Islands, with their rearing headlands and fir-clothed surface. Following in the line of the route, our tug is now propelled into Griffin Bay, the sheet of water that divides the two last named islands. The observer is now commencing to be shifted in and out among the lofty islands, catching views of different mountain ranges, and of the grand sentinel peaks of Washington Territory. Mts. Tacoma, Baker, Olympus and Constance, as well as other minor ones. Pursuing in the charted course, a landing is made at San Juan, the beginning of a city. Still fearless of the salted depths, we wind through the San Juan channel and effect a landing at Friday Harbor, quite a little island town, with many bright faces. Passing out and circling around to the westward, through Speiden Channel, many small and rocky islets are passed, until the tug is tied up at Roash Harbor, an enterprising little city, with its adjoining and inexhaustible ledges of lime stone, immense in quantity and prime in quality. Lime kilns of great dimensions were to be seen, and all seemed to be actively engaged. It is destined to become a great industry, although it is as yet only partially developed. These San Juan Islands are chiefly noted for lime and iron. One of these substances may be found in the various islands and islets.

Resuming our journey, we return to the south of Orcas Island and pass up into Busk Bay, touching at Orcas and Evart Sound, two small towns on Oscar Island. Returning down the bay, we pass to the east, through the narrows, past Destruction Island, into the southwestern Straits of Georgia, thence continuing due north the main land is reached, as well as the terminous of our journey to the series of cities—Whatcom, Bellingham and Sehome, these places being all in one chain along the beach.

The last point has been rounded, the narrows have been safely navigated, the golden tints from the rays of the setting sun have been hidden beneath the nocturnal shades of night. The full orbed moon, the mute intruder of night and darkness, has turned its luminous face to the seafaring as well as the landsman, he has been a welcome visitor throughout the long and tedious hours of the night; but the rays of the resplendent sun, with early and misty morning, recommences to dapple the eastern horizon as of old; the bright evening light is dimmed; its silvery light upon the clear dusky waters is disappearing, the land is in the twilight, the sun has only told of its coming. Betwixt this natural phenomenon the heights of the city are seen—now lost—faintly—a glimmer—a light from the low-burning night lamp, it pictures a "view so weird" and half unreal, that one fancies it may all be a mirage, till suddenly the Outre-mer-wharf has been reached, and the city lies now spread out in its reality.

One is yet a good distance from terra firma, but allah! it is only an insignificant distance; the passage is built on piles and planked. The harbor in the direction of Whatcom is very shallow, but, on the other hand, the harbor on the Sehome side is of a good depth and admits deep going vessels. Coming into the city, we expected to arouse some enthusiast who would harbor us and prepare us some breakfast, and to our good fortune some one awoke and we were tendered the glance of welcome and hospitality from our hostess. After ascertaining the doings and probabilities of the city and adjoining country, we take leave and depart.

The streets of the business part of the city are built on piles, as well as the buildings. You can hear the surging of the sea and the flow of the tide as you pass up or down its streets; houses are built at different altitudes—some are just out of the tide, others again are even with the sidewalks. The hotels are the same as at other coast cities.

Climbing a sloping hill we reach the residence part of the city, widely scattered. A few churches of common architecture were to be seen. The city has no public edifices of note, and it is in short one of those forecast cities, nourished by the intercourse of the sea. The railroad, the great "civilizer of nations," has as yet not reached beyond to the arterial system of railroads. One is under construction from Whatcom to Ft. Hope, B. C., and this item cuts deep in the affairs of Whatcom, and of course the natural bent is to raise an old western boom instantly.

Whatcom, the city if you please, is one of those forgotten spots of the United States, which the school'boy of the East to-day has little or no knowledge of; the term runs through his mind and is lost—it left the imprint. The city of Whatcom may still become noted. It has wealth to resort to. An abundance of coal underlies the harbor as well as the city. A large coal mine was worked there for several years, until the great fire in the mine, which occurred some time ago, when it was found necessary to fill the mine with water from the harbor, causing the total destruction of the shafts. It is contemplated in the near future to open up this wealth.

Permit me to quote a few lines from the Governor's report to the Secretary of the Interior for 1884: "It is estimated that there is enough agricultural land in Whatcom County to support a population of 100,000." And again he says: "Iron ore, said to be in quantity and quality equal to that found on Lake Superior, is found in abundance here in the vicinity of the coal fields, and there are also strong indications of petroleum." He further goes on to say: "Whatcom Lake, 12 miles long, with an elevation of 316 feet above the city, is discharged through Whatcom creek into Bellingham Bay, and furnishes the grandest water power on the Pacific coast for manufacturing purposes and insures an abundant supply of fresh water for domestic use."

Bellingham Bay is a land-locked harbor, six by twelve miles. It is beyond a doubt one of the finest harbors in the world. It is said that it is sufficiently large to accommodate the united fleets of every nation as safe at anchor as in a dock. It is 18 miles from the Straits of Fuca, and 120 from the Pacific ocean. and enables the largest ocean crafts from the Orient to sail into port directly. This is an unsought for advantage over others. Bellingham Bay is in the near future destined to become, from the present aspect, the terminus of the N. P. R. R., Central P. R. R., S. P. R. R., Manitoba, and the American terminus of the C. P. R. R.

The finest quality of building stone on the Pacific coast is found here—the celebrated "Chuckanut stone." Whatcom County, taken collectively, is a wonder field of inexhautible resources, treasured for the people of these United States. Having expounded a few facts concerning the available resources of Whitcom County, we now leave the rest to the comer and the coming.

Now, along this island route to Whatcom, some grand scenery has awed, and enchanted us as the voyage has twisted about, turned all the points, leaped the islands and braved the tidal currents of the narrows. It is a strain upon the mind, if you choose, in wondering at the perfect and accomplished work of the beginning—a continuous viewing of sublime scenery, mountain peaks and chasms, perpendicular and towering cliffs, hundreds of feet high, snow capped peak and mountain chain, the battlements of the clouds, clouds ascending from the briny sea, are carried through the gorges and lifted to other parts through the azure space. It may be truthfully asserted that the "land of the setting sun," as the Pacific west is called, is without a parallel in scenic history.

If we put it in these words: Every cliff has a treasure, every island a wealth, who will argue to the contrary? One has said, "one must see to appreciate," and it is true. One day's traveling is a repetition of the previous one. It is a continued chain of untiring objects—pictures on the pages of nature, valued alike in the estimation of the tourist and the man who travels in the affairs of his common interests. One spins around the world—he sees, he feels, and he lays up unperishable stores of practical knowledge and loftiness of aim.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I will say that when one undertakes to narrate the picturesque objects in diversified nature, he needs courage and must be brave, else he will capsize his nimble craft in the first breakers that are hurled from eddying waters against his ship. The island passage through the San Juan group of islands, is, to say the least, a continuous line of grandeur of the most picturesque type. I have only shown a specimen, an imperfect sketch for the mind. Certainly you know that an Outling as well appreciates a retreat from the busy cares of life, and delights in the desirable honor of seeing when, especially in the early autumn, all is sombrous and delicious to the mind.

A Poor Year for Bosses.

Minnesota bosses seem to be out of luck all around this year. The rank and file of the democratic party wanted to nominate Dr. Ames, but the bosses said "no, you have got to take Wilson!" and the bosses had their way about that. The bosses in the republican party said "you have got to take McGill!" but "the kids" took a notion that "we didn't have to" Result: Bosses sulking in their tent or openly kicking and "the kids" out rolling up 15,000 majority for Merriam.

LOW RAILROAD FARES.

Canada Excursions.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40.00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

For through tickets at the lowest rates to all parts of the Continent and full particulars regarding these excursions, call upon or write the nearest ticket agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry., C. H. Mix, agent, Crookston, or to F. I. Whitney, G. P. A., St. Paul. [28-34]

Cheap Excursions to Points East.

The Northern Pacific R. R. announce a series of seven special excursions from Grand Forks, Dak., to points in Eastern Canada and return during November and December.

With the completion and opening of the new line through to Winnipeg the Northern Pacific R. We desire to call special attention to these accommodations as they are an entirely new departure to the traveling public of North Dakota. Bear in mind that no other line offers similar inducements, and, notwithstanding the attractions of fast time, through cars, Pullman sleeping cars and magnificent dining cars, via the Northern Pacific, the fare is always as low as via any other route.

For full information regarding routes, rates, etc., apply to the nearest ticket agent of the Northern Pacific R. R. W. E. Germaine, passenger and ticket agent, Grand Forks, H. W. SERMON ON PICTURES.

What the Rev. Dr. Talmage has to Say About Painting and Other Works of Art.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 28.—The subject of Dr Talmage's discourse was "The Divine Mission of Pictures. His text was Isaiah, Ch. 2, parts of the 12th and 16th verses—"The way of the Lord of Hosts shall be upon all pleasant pictures." He said:

Pictures are by some relegated to the realm of the trivial, accidental, sentimental or worldly, but my text shows that God scrutinizes pictures, and whether they are good or bad, whether used for right or wrong purposes, is a matter of divine observation and arraignment.

The divine mission of pictures is my subject.

That the artist's pencil and the engraver's knife have sometimes been made subservient to the kingdom of the bad is frankly admitted. After the ashes and scoria were removed from Herculaneum and Pompeii the walls of those cities discovered to the explorers a degradation in art which cannot be exaggerated. Satan and all his imps have always wanted the fingering of the easel; they would rather have possession of that than the art of printing, for types are not so potent and quick for evil as pictures. The powers of darkness think they have gained a triumph, and they have, when in some respectable parlor or public gallery they can hang a canvass embarrassing to the good, but fascinating to the evil.

It is not in the spirit of prudery, but backed up by God's eternal truth when I say that you have no right to hang in your art rooms or dwelling houses that which would be offensive to good people if the figures were alive in your parlor and the guests of your household. A picture that you have to hang in a somewhat secluded place, or that in a public hall you cannot with a group of friends deliberately stand before and discuss, ought to have a knife stabbed into it at the top and cut through to the bottom, and a stout finger thrust in on the right side ripping clear through to the left. Pliny, the elder, lost his life by going near enough to see the inside of Vesuvius, and the further you can stand off from the burning crater of sin, the better. Never till the books of the last day are opened shall we know what has been the dire harvest of evil pictorials and unbecoming art galleries. Despoil a man's imagination and he becomes a moral carcass. The show windows of English and American cities in which the low theaters have sometimes hung long lines of brazen actors and actresses in styles insulting to all propriety have made a broad path to death for multitudes of people. But so have all the other arts been at times suborned of evil.

How has music been bedraggled! Is there any place so low down in dessoluteness that into it has not been carried David's harp, Handel's organ, and Gottschalk's piano and Ole Bull's violin; and the flute, which though named after so insignificant a thing as the Sicilian eel, which has seven spots on the side like flute holes, yet for thousands of years has had an exalted mission. Architecture, born in the heart of Him who made the worlds, under its arches and across its floors what bacchanalian revelries have been enacted! It is not against any of these arts that they have been so led into captivity. What a poor world this would be if were not for what my text calls "pleasant pictures!" I refer to your knowledge of the Holy Scriptures has not been mightly augmented by the woodcuts or engravings in the old family Bible, which father and mother read out of, and laid on the table in the old homestead when you were boys and girls. The Bible scenes which we all carry in our minds were not gotten from the Bible typology, but from the Bible pictures. To prove the truth of it in my own case, the other day I took up the old family Bible which I inherited. Sure enough, what I have carried in my mind of Jacob's ladder; and so with Samson carrying off the gates of Gaza; Elisha restoring the Shunamite's son; the massacre of the innocents; Christ blessing little children; the crucifixion and the last judgment. My idea of all these is that of the old Bible engravings which I scanned before I could read a word. That is true with nine-tenths o you. If I could swing open the door of your foreheads I would find that you are walking picture galleries.

The great intelligence abroad about the Bible did not come from the general reading of the book, for the majority of the people read it but little, if they read it at all; but all the sacred scenes have been put before the great masses, and not printer's ink, but the pictorial art must have the credit of the achievement. First, painter's pencil for the favored few, and then engraver's plate or woodcut for millions! What overwhelming commentary on the Bible, what reinforcement for patriarchs, prophets, apostles and Christ, what distribution of Scripture knowledge of all nations in the paintings and engravings therefrom of Holman Hunt's "Christ in the Temple;" Paul Veronese's "Magdalen Washing the Feet of Christ;" Raphael's "Michael, the Archangel;" Albert Durer's "Dragon of the Apocalypse;" Michael Angelo's "Plague of the Fiery Serpents;" Tintoret's "Flight into Egypt;" Rubens' "Descent from the Cross;" Leonardo Da Vinci's "Last Supper;" Claude's "Queen of Sheba;" Bellini's "Madonna of Milan;" Orcagna's "Last Judgment," and hundreds of miles of pictures if they were put in line, illustrating, displaying, dramatizing, irradiating Bible truths until the Scriptures are to-day so much on paper as on canvass not so much on ink as in all the colors of the spectrum. In 1883 forth from Strasburg, Germany, there came a child that was to eclipse in speed and boldness and grandeur anything and everything that the world had seen since the first color appeared on the sky at the creation, Paul Gustav Dore. At eleven years of age he published marvelous lithographs of himself. Saying nothing of what he did for Milton's "Paradise Lost," emblazoning it on the attention of the world, he takes up the Book of Books, the monarch of literature, the Bible, and in his pictures "The Creation of Light," "The Trial of Abraham's Faith," "The Burial of Sarah," "Joseph Sold by His Brethren," "The Brazen Serpent." "Boaz and Ruth." "David and Goliath." "The Transfiguration." "The Marriage in Cana," "Babylon Fallen," and 250 Scriptural scenes in all, with a boldness and a grasp and almost supernatural afflatus that make the heart throb, and the brain reel, and the tears start, and the the cheeks blanch, and the entire nature quake with the tremendous things of God and eternity and the dead. I actually staggered down the steps of the London art gallery under the power of Dore's "Christ leaving the Praetorium." Profess you to be a Christian man or woman, and seen divine mission in art, and acknowledge you no obligation either in thanks to God or man?

It is no more the word of God when put before us the printer's ink than by skillfully laying on of colors, or designs on mental through incision or corrosion. What a lesson in morals was presented by Hogarth, the painter, in his two pictures, "The Rake's Progress," and the "Miser's Feast;" and by Thomas Cole's engravings of the "Voyage of Human Life," and the "Course of Empire," and by "Turner's Slave Ship." God in art! Christ in art!; Patriarchs, prophets and apostles in art! Angels in art! Heaven in art!

The world and the church ought to come to the higher appreciation of the divine missions of pictures, yet the authors of them have generally been left to semi-starvation. West, the great painter, toiled in unappreciation till, being a great skater, while on the ice he formed the acquaintance of Gen. Howe of the British army, and through coming to admire West as a skater, they gradually came to appreciate as much that which he accomplished by his hand as by his heel. Poussin, the mighty painter, was pursued, and had nothing with which to defend himself against the mob but the artist's portfolio, which he held over his head to keep off the stones hurled at him. The pictures of Richard Wilson, of England, sold for fabulous sums of money after his death, but the living painter was glad to get for his "Alcyone" a piece of Stilton cheese. From 1640 to 1643 there were 4,000 pictures willfully destroyed. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was the habit of some people to spend much of their time in knocking pictures to pieces. In the reign of Charles the First it was ordered by parliament that all pictures of Christ be burnt.

Painters were so badly treated and humiliated in the beginning of the 18th century that they were lowered clear down out of the sublimity of their art, and obliged to give minute accounts of what they did with their colors, as a painters bill which came to publication in Scotland, in 1707, indicated. The painter had been touching up some old pictures in the church, and he sends in this itemized bill to the vestry: "To filling up a chink in the Red sea and repairing the damages to Pharaoh's hosts;" "to a new pair of hands for Daniels in the lion's den, and a new set of teeth for the lioness;" "to repairing Nebuchadnezzar's beard;" "to giving a blush to the cheek of Eve on presenting the apple to Adam;" "to making a bridle for the Good Samaritan's horse and mending one of his legs;" "to putting on a new handle on Moses' basket and fitting bulrushes, and adding more fuel to the fire in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace." So painters were humiliated clear down below the majesty of their art. The oldest pictures in England, a portrait of Chaucer, though now of great value, was picked out of a lumber garret. Great were the trials of Quentin Matsys, who toiled on from Blacksmith's anvill till as a painter he won wide recognition.

The first missionaries to Mexico made the fatal mistake of destroying pictures, for the loss of which art and religion must ever lament. But why go so far back when in this year of our Lord, 1888, and within 12 years of the 20th century, to be a painter, except in rare exceptions, means poverty and neglect? poorly fed, poorly clad, poorly housed, because poorly appreciated! When I hear a man is a painter, I have two feelings, one of admiration for the greatness of his soul, and the other of commiseration for the needs of his body.

But so it has been in all departments of noble work. Some of the mightiest have been hardly treated. Oliver Goldsmith had such a big patch on the coat over his left breast that when he went anywhere he kept his hat in his hand closely pressed over the patch. The world renowned Bishop Asbury had a salary of $64 a year. Painters are not the only ones who have endured the lack of appreciation. Let men of wealth take under their patronage the suffering men of art. They lift no complaint; they make no strike for higher wages. But with a keenness of nervous organization which almost always characterizes genius, these artists suffer more than anyone but God can realize. There needs to be a concerted effort for the suffering artists of America, not sentimental discourse about what we owe to artists, but contracts that give them a livelihood; for I am in full sympathy with the Christian farmer, who was very busy gathering his fall apples, and someone asked him to pray for a poor family, the father of which had broken his leg; and the busy farmer said: "I cannot stop now to pray, but you can go down into the cellar and get some corned beef, and butter, and eggs, and potatoes; that is all I can do now." Artists may wish for our prayers, but they also want practical help from men who can give them work.

You have heard scores of sermons for all other kinds of suffering men and women, but I think this is the first sermon ever preached that made a plea for the suffering men and women of American art. Their work is more true to nature and life than any of the masterpieces that have become immortal on the other side of the sea, but it is the fashion of Americans to mention foreign artists, and to know little or nothing about our own Copley, and Allston, and Inman, and Greenough, and Kenset. Let the affluent fling out of their windows and into the back yard valueless daubs on canvas, and call in these splendid but unrewarded men, and tell them to adorn your walls, not only with that which shall please the taste, but enlarge the mind and improve the morals and save the souls of those who gaze upon them.

Brooklyn, and all other American cities, need great galleries of art, not only open annually for a few days on exhibition, but which shall stand open all the year round, and from early morning until 10 o'clock at night, and free to all who would come and go. What a preparation for the wear and tear of the day a five minutes' look in the morning at some picture that will open a door into some larger realm than that in which our population daily drudge! Or what a good thing the half hour of artistic opportunity on the way home in the evening from exhaustion that demands recuperation for mind and soul, as well as body! Who will do for Brooklyn or the city where you live what W. W. Corcoran did for Washington, and what I am told John Wannamaker, by the donation of De Munkacsy's great picture, Christ Before Pilate," is going to do for Philadelphia? Men of wealth, if you are too modest to build and endow such a place during your lifetime, why not go to your iron safe, and take out your last will and testament, and make a codicil that shall build for the city of your residence a throne for American art? Take some of that money that would otherwise spoil your children, and build an art gallery that shall associate your name forever, not only with the great masters of painting, who are gone, but with the great masters who are trying to live; and also win the admiration and love of tens of thousands of people, who, unable to have fine pictures of their own, would be advantaged by your benefaction. Build your own monuments, and not leave it to the whim of others. Some of the best people sleeping in Greenwood have no monuments at all, or some crumbling stones that in a few years will let the rain wash out name and epitaph: while some men, whose death was the abatement of a nuisance, have a pile of polished Aberdeen high enough for a king, and eulogium enough to embarrass a seraph.

Oh, man of large wealth, instead of leaving to the whim of others your monumental commemoration and epitaphology to be looked at when people are going to and fro at the burial of others, build right down in the heart of our great city, or the city where you live, an immense free reading-room, or a free musical conservatory, or a free art gallery, the niches for sculpture, and the walls abloom with the rise and fall of nations, and lessons of courage for the disheartened, and rest for the weary, and life for the dead; and 150 years from now you will be wielding influences in this world for good among those whose great-grandfather was your great-grandchild. How much better than white marble that chills you if you put your hand on it when you touch it in the cemetery would be a monument in colors, in beaming eyes, in living possession, in splendor which under the chandelier would be glowing and warm, and looked at by strolling groups with catalogue in hand on the January night when the necropolis where the body sleeps is all snowed under. The tower of David was hung with one thousand dented shields of battle; but you, oh man of wealth, may have a grander tower named after you, one that shall be hung not with the symbols of carnage, but with the victories of that art which was so long ago recognized in my text as "pleasant pictures."

Oh, the power of pictures! I cannot deride, as some have done, Cardinal Mazarin, who, when told that he must die took his last walk through the art gallery of his palace, saying, "Must I quit all this? Look at that Titian! Look at that Corregio! Look at that deluge of Caracci! Farewell, dear pictures!" As the day of the Lord of Hosts, according to this text will scrutinize the pictures, I implore all parents to see that in their households they have neither in book or newspaper or on canvas anything that will deprave. Pictures are no longer the exclusive possession of the affluent. There is not a respectable home in these cities that has not specimens of woodcut or steel engravings, if not of painting, and your whole family will feel the moral uplifting and depression. Having nothing on your wall or in books that will familiarize the young with scenes of cruelty or wassail; have only those sketches made by artists in elevated moods, and none of those scenes that seem the product of artistic delirium tremens. Pictures are not only a strong but universal language. The human race is divided into almost as many languages as there are nations, but the pictures may speak to people of all tongues. Volapuk many have hoped, with little reason, would become a world-wide language, and printers' types have no emphasis compared with it. We say that children are fond of pictures, but notice any man when he takes up a book and you will see that the first thing that he looks at is the pictures. Have only those in your house that appeal to the better nature. One engraving has sometimes decided an eternal destiny. Under the title of fine arts there have come here from France a class of pictures which elaborate argument has tried to prove irreproachable. They would disgrace a barroom, and they need to be confiscated. Your children will carry the pictures of their father's house with them clear on to the grave, and, passing that marble pillar, will take them through eternity.

Furthermore, let all reformers, and all Sabbath school teachers, and all Christian workers realize that if they would be effective for good, they must make pictures, if not by chalk on blackboards, or kindergarten designs, or by pencil on canvas, then by words. Arguments are soon forgotten; but pictures, whether in language or in colors, are what produce strongest effects. Christ was always telling what a thing was like, and His sermon on the mount was a great picture gallery, beginning with a sketch of a "city on a hill that cannot be hid," and ending with a tempest beating against two houses, one on the rock and the other on the sand. The parable of the prodigal son, a picture; parable of the sower, who went forth to sow, a picture; parable of the 10 virgins, a picture; parable of the talents, a picture. The world wants pictures, and the appetite begins with the child, who consents to go early to bed if the mother will sit beside him and rehearse a story, which is only a picture.

When we see how much is accomplished in secular directions by pictures—Shakespeare's tragedies a picture, Victor Hugo's writings all pictures, John Ruskin's and Tennyson's and Longfellow's works all pictures—why not enlist, as far as possible, for our churches and schools and reformatory work and evangelistic endeavor, the power of thought that can be put into word pictures, if not pictures in color? Yes, why not all young men draw for themselves on paper, with pen or pencil, their coming career, of virtue if they prefer that, of vice if they prefer that. After making the picture, put it on the wall, or paste it on the fly leaf of some favorite book, that you may have it before you. I read the other day of a man who had been executed for murder, and the jailer found afterward a picture made on the wall of the cell by the assassin's own hand, a picture of a flight of stairs. On the lowest step he had written, "Disobedience of Parents;" on the second, "Sabbath Breaking;" on the third, Drunkeness and Gambling;" on the fourth, "Murder;" and on the fifth and top step, "A Gallows." If that man had made that picture before he took the first step, he never would have taken any of them. Oh, man, make another picture, a bright picture, an evangelical picture, and I will help you make it! I suggest six steps for this flight of stairs. On the first step write the words, "A Nature Changed by the Holy Ghost and Washed in the blood of the Lamb;" on the second step, "Industry and Good Companionship;" on the third step, "A Christian home with a family altar;" on the fourth step: "Ever widening usefulness;" on the fifth step: "A glorious departure from this world;" on the sixth step: "Heaven! heaven! heaven!" Write it three times, and let the letters of one word be made up of banners, the second of coronets, and the third of thrones. Promise me that you will do that, and I will promise to meet you on the sixth step, if the Lord will through His pardoning grace bring me there too.

And here I am going to say a word of cheer to people who have never had a word of consolation on that subject. There are men and women in the world by hundreds of thousands, some of them are here today, who have a fine natural taste, and yet all their lives that taste has been suppressed, and although they could appreciate the galleries of Dresden and Vienna and Naples far more than 999 out of 1,000 who visit them, they never may go, for they must support their households, and bread and schooling for their children are of more importance than pictures. Though fond of music they are compelled to live amid discord, and though fond of architecture, they dwell in clumsy abodes; and though appreciative of all that engravings and paintings can do, they are in perpetual deprivation. You are going, after you get on the sixth step of that stairs just spoken of, to find yourselves in the royal gallery of the universe, the concentered splendors of all worlds before your transported vision. In some way all the thrilling scenes through which we and the Church of God have passed in our earthly state will be pictured or brought to mind. At the cyclorama of Gettysburg, which we had in Brooklyn, one day a blind man, who lost his sight in that battle, was with his child heard talking while standing before that picture. The blind man said to his daughter: "Are there at the right of the picture some regiments marching up a hill?" "Yes," she said. "Well," said the blind man, "is there a general on horseback leading them on?" "Yes," she said. "Well, is there rushing down on these men a cavalry charge?" "Yes," was the reply. "And do there seem to be many dying and dead?" "Yes," was the answer. "Well, now, do you see a shell from the woods bursting near the wheel of a cannon?" "Yes," she said. "Stop right there!" said the blind man. "That is the last thing I saw on earth! What a time it was, Jenny, when I lost my eye-sight!"

But when you, who found life a hard battle, a very Gettysburg, shall stand in the royal gallery of heaven, and with your new vision begin to see and understand that which in your earthly blindness you could not see at all, you will point out to your celestial comrades, perhaps to your own dear children who have gone before, the scenes of the earthly conflicts in which you participated, saying: "There from that hill of prosperity I was driven back; in that valley of humiliation I was wounded. There I lost my eyesight. That was the way the world looked when I saw it. But what a grand thing to get celestial vision, and stand here before the cyclorama of all worlds, while the rider on the white horse goes on "conquering and to conquer," the moon under His feet and the stars of heaven for His tiara!

An Angry Cat.

While two young men were shooting at a target just outside of the city limits on Chenango street, says the Binghamton N.Y. Republican, a pet cat met with a peculiar experience. The guns used were Winchester rifles, and the bullets sped against the target with great force sufficient to penetrate a beam six inches square. The cat was prowling around the barn for mice, more than forty feet from the target, when she was startled by a piece of wood which rapped her smartly alongside the head. The stick had been hit by a bullet and bounded several rods. The cat made a leap of nearly a rod and landed in a barbed-fence. She was so excited by what she considered an attempt to bar her flight from danger that she immediatly gave battle. The fence stood its ground and fought back, which so enraged the cat that she determined then and there to annihilate it at any cost. She made a pass at one of the barbs and left several fingers of her glove hanging there. Her teeth were then brought to play, and no dentist could have removed them from their parent gums more neatly.

Had she then stopped and calmly considered her chances of routing the fence her good sense would have prevailed, perhaps, and further bloodshed been averted. But she was so blinded by fury that to argue with her would have been fruitless. With a yowl that was heard at Port Dick she clawed at another keen barb and another yard of cat remained to tell the story of her folly. She continued to bite and scratch for some time, and only left when she had been completly disarmed. She was horribly lacerated in the struggle, but will recover.

Pain in His Amputaued Feet,

From the Atlanta Constitution.

Dr. J. S. Wilson, whose feet were cut off by a switch engine in Augusta, was on the streets in a roller chair, looking the picture of health and contentment. The lower part of his body was covered with a shawl, and he was surrounded by his friends who were delighted to see him out. He said: "I suffer more from pain in my feet than from anything else, although my feet were amputated two months ago. I can still feel the pain and itching in my toes and in the ball of my feet, although as I tell you they have been buried for two months. The nerves are still irritated. I suppose this weird pain will wear off after a while."

A LITTLE.

So little made me glad, for I was young;
Flowers, a sunset, books, a friend or two,
Gray skies with scanty sunshine piercing through—
How little made me glad when I was young!

So little makes me happy, now I'm old;
Your hand in mine, dear hearts' here by the fire;
The children grown unto our hearts' desire—
How little keeps us happy when we're old.

And yet between the little then and now,
What words of life and thought and feeling keen!
What spiritual depths and heights unseen!
Ah, me! between the little then and now.

For little things seem mighty when we're young;
Then we rush onward through the changing years,
Testing the gamut of all smiles and tears,
Till mighty things seem little: we are old.

THE AVENGING FINGER

Translated from the French of Louis Daresne.

"A devilish night!" cried Master Yvon, skillfully bringing his boat to anchor; "not even a sardine for my pains! But the wind and the fishing, too, will be much the better to-morrow!"

And Yvon was right in his estimate of the weather, for the roaring blasts that swept the sea at the moment, flinging it upon the sands in spray and heaps of foam that buried themselves with furious howlings in the silent and sombre streets of the village, would all be gone by morning.

The boat at anchor, the fisherman drew from the bottom of it the huge fishing sacks, now absolutely empty, threw them upon his back, remounted the strand and turned his steps toward his distant dwelling. A rough sailor, this Master Yvon, tall, broad-shouldered and tanned to the color of an orange by the salty winds, who never sulked at work, and whom they saw (when others, frightened by the tempests, remained in the village), smiling and indifferent, make ready his boat unaided and put to sea.

This evening, even, despite the counsels of his companions and the supplications of his wife, he had embarked as usual, not to return till morning, but decidedly the weather was too heavy—the harvest did not come, and, ma foi! he had put about, and by twelve o'clock was safe in port again. One thought alone consoled him for his bad fortune—he was going to surprise his Catherine, his dear treasure, and to pass beside her the hours of work, that the ocean refused to allow him to take from it. Ah! well, happiness gave him patience, and to-morrow, after a night like this, the game would be hungry —the fishing marvelous!

He loved his wife so much, this brave Yvon, she whom he had seen play when a little one before the shop of her father, the wheelwright. They had passed these joyous moments together, participating in the same plays, in the same stream of sunlight entering between the wheels of the chariots undergoing repairs, and mingling their cries and shouts of laughter with the sonorious strokes of the hammers. Then Cathering had grown up, and Yvon, who had commenced to pass his days upon the sea, no longer dared to talk with her as of old. Nevertheless, on Sundays, when all the country side climbed the coast to the little chapel at Morlach, he followed from afar the movements of the village swains about this beautiful girl, his jealous eye resting always upon one above all others.

This one was the handsome Dominique, the assistant of the wheelwright. Catherine's father. Invariably clothed in a fresh blouse, clean and well-fitting, his hair brushed smoothly and scented with pomade, and a flower nodding in his buttonhole, he traversed the Place do la Marche with the air of conqueror, addressing himself with smiles and condescending nods to the wives and girls of the village, and to which they as affably responded. On fete days, when he appeared at the ball that closed the exercises of the occasion, all eyes were turned upon him again, while they awaited with evident anxiety his selection of a partner for the evening.

But Dominique in nowise hurried himself, but made the tour of the hall, examined them tranquilly, and then cast his choice on the most beautiful. Frequently it seemed to lookers on at this game of vanity that he lost his time when he stopped before the daughter of the wheelwright, for Catherine manifested for the workman of her father an indifference bordering upon aversion. The women chafed her about it, accused her of being proud, and declared that the handsome Dominique was spoiled for her eyes by a frightful disfigurement that he carried upon his left hand—a disfigurement that he had received when working from the manner of a comrade. The middle finger of the hand hung useless and stupefied, the flesh shriveled from the bone, bluish and hideous.

As time passed on, and under the spur of Dominique's gallantries, Yvon regained his courage, and one beautiful morning made his demand upon Father Francois for the hand of his daughter. He was steady, honest, full of ardor for work, and loved her dearly; the old man consented, moved perhaps by the avowal that Catherine had made to him of her preference for the fisherman. As for Dominique, from the moment of the public betrothment he affected to see the young girl no more and kept himself in retirement.

Ah, but the wedding day was truly beautiful; Father Francois wished to do everything well; a half dozen violins and horns were hired for the occasion, and the supper was the astonishment of the village. It was two years now that Catherine had been called Mme. Yvon.

Never had the fisherman been able to dream of his wife as he was dreaming of her this night without evoking a host of sweet memories that brought the smile of a happy man to soften his swarthy face and at times a tear of tenderness to glisten in his eye.

"Tonnerre, what a wind!" and he ran for his cap, that the blast had carried away. "Poor Catherine!" he added immediately; "dear soul, who believes me still upon the sea!"

By this time Yvon had come to the corner of the street at the end of which was his tidy cottage, isolated and far away from all its neighbors. He raised his head like a horse in sight of its stable—he was home again—he started on with longer strides—to stop immediately, astounded!

"Tions!" said he, "its lighted; she's not abed yet, but prays, perhaps, for my safety!"

As the words fell from his lips the outline of a human form showed itself upon the half curtain that shaded the little window—the outlines of a man's form! A man in his house—at twelve at night—with Catherine—Mon Dieu! if it were—but no, he refused to comprehend or to finish the thought that had flashed across his mind—he refused even to suspect his unhappiness! At the same time, as the howling of the wind masked the noise of his footsteps, he would be able to approach but leave them unsuspicious of his presence. He pressed himself against the wall of his dwelling—he mounted upon the stone that supported the gutter—he looked in the chamber. Catherine was there, reclining in her chair, beautiful, rosy and smiling; beside her a man who at the moment—even as Yvon's eyes fell upon him—drew his wife into his arms and pressed upon her lips a kiss of adieu. That man—a thousand devils!—that man—was Dominique!

Under this blow of fate the colossus staggered like a beet under the butcher's hammer; he supported himself against the window frame, his legs trembling, his hands convulsively tearing at the scarf that seemed to stop his breathing. And thus, while he exposed his life to win the bread for the household, his wife, whom he had adored like a madman —his wife—profited by his absence to treacherously deceive him! The shock was too much—the strong man began to cry, and many things that had passed unnoticed by the confiding husband returned to mind to torture him. Parbleu! but it had gone on a long time, this pretended hate for the wheelwright's workman —this pretended hate that was to turn suspicion. And those marks of passionate love given to him, the husband? Lies again—vile hypocrisies to capture his confidence! Bah, the miserable guilty wretch whom he had loved so much!

The noise of the door closing softly and a shadow moving away roused the fisherman from his trance of agony—in an instant he was transfigured—a whirlwind of fury surged into his brain—blood blinded him! With a turn of the wrist he threw off his heavy shoes, bent his body like a runner making for his goal, and bounded upon the tracks of the lover so full of security and satisfaction with himself, and who followed, carelessly whistling a tune, with hands in his pockets, a narrow pathway enframed between two hedges. He had arrived almost at the main street of the hamlet, when suddenly two powerful hands closed upon his neck, clutching it with a grasp of iron. Dominique gasped, wavered, bent to his knees—and lay with without a moan!

Twenty minutes later Yvon returned to the strand, moving in the direction of his boat. He still carried upon his shoulders a fishing sack, but so heavily loaded this time that he walked with difficulty, and every instant slipped upon the pebbles, round and polished. Arrived at last at his bark, he threw down his burden; it fell with a thud upon the piles of stones that constituted the ballast. The tide had turned, and already the waves were lapping under the keel of the little vessel. The fisherman seated himself in his accustomed place, propped his feet upon the sack in the bottom, drew out his pipe and began to smoke. To smoke—aye—but not for long—a half hour, not more. When the movement of the boat and the wash of the waves told him the hour had come, he drew up his anchor, cast off his line and the vessel, obedient to the oars vigorously handled, drew rapidly away.

The tempest had lulled considerably; in the harbor the water was nearly tranquil, but the harbor was evidently not far enough for the sailor's purposes; he hoisted the sail and stood for the open sea. An hour perhaps he sailed thus in the midst of the shadows, but he stopped at last, and at that moment the moon broke from the clouds that veiled it and spread upon the water a grain of silver.

"It will do," he murmured, considering it carefully, "'tis far enough!" and he drew from his pocket a broad-bladed clasp knife carried by men of his calling, knelt upon the sack before him and delivered himself to the mysterious work that filled him, judging by the smile upon his lips, with satisfaction. This work accomplished, the sack was loaded with stones from the pile of ballast and cast into the depths of the sea, the fisherman lighted his pipe anew, threw out his lines baited as they had been in the beginning of the evening and began to fish.

Not until broad daylight, later than his usual hour, did he withdraw them again and start on the homeward journey. Catherine—he saw her from afar—waited for him upon the deserted beach with every sound of profound disquietude, the way of wives in general, and faithful wives in particular. In a transport of dissimulation and tenderness she threw herself upon the breast of her husband.

"Mon Dieu!" she cried," but thou art late. I knew not what to think of it, and the horrible tempest that has raged since thy departure! I do not wish thee to go out in weather like this again! How I have prayed to Our Lady!"

"Prayed to Our Lady, and for me?" Yvon responded with a singular smile; "ah well, thou seest thy prayer is granted—I have returned, and the fishing was excellent. But come, I have yet to disembarrass my lines—they are loaded. Thou shalt help me at the task. Begin!"

Had Catherine been looking at her husband as he spoke, the cold and cruel expression of his face, the relentless tightening of his lips, would have made her heart die within her, but she saw and suspected nothing in her eagerness to measure the harvest the tempest had brought them. Bonnets, dresses, frill-fralls, and the thousand and one nothings dear to a woman's soul were bound up in those scaly treasures. Accustomed to assisting her husband, she worked rapidly and well; the pile of fish upon the gravel beside her steadily increased in proportions.

All at once she stopped as if stung by an adder, her eyes, wild and staring, fixed upon a hook that she held in her hand, the only one in fact upon which the fish had left the bait untasted. She lifted herself with a bound, and with hoarse and strangled cries pointed to the object swinging at the end of it.

"What!" said Yvon, who had watched her closely, "thou dost not like it, that dainty bait with which I fed my fishes? Regard it again, my precious treasure; regard it again, I beseech thee; nay, more than that, I command thee, thou who hast spent the night in praying to Our Lady!"

Alas, poor Catherine! the command was useless. White as a winding sheet an image of abject shame and fear, she stood with her eyes bent always on the end of the line, where, bound securely upon the pointed hook, swung a gastly bleeding fragment, a mangled, tumefied human finger, the flesh shriveled and shrinking from the bone, and bluish and hideous! for an instant she stood as I tell you, staring down at it, unable to credit the evidence of her own sense.

"Dost thou know it? said Yvon again, with a cynical smile.

Did she know it? His voice broke the spell that bound her—she threw up her hands to ward off the accusing sight, staggered a step or two, and fell insensible!

To-day you will find her an inmate of the Masion de Sante at Poissy, a woman raving ceaselessly of the life of the sea, of a fearful tempest and a haunting vision of a mutilated bleeding human finger.—N. Y Mercury.

The Art of Whispering.

We are sometimes inclined to consider whispering one of the lost arts. Doubtless the perplexed school-teacher, frequently conscious of a faint buzz in a remote corner of the school-room, would not agree with us, but in public assemblies, and especially on convention platforms, many people seem to have forgotten how to whisper. It is bad enough for them to "forget their manners" sufficiently to converse in the most quiet whisper, but when they actually talk out loud it becomes unendurable. Yet more than once have we witnessed this breach of manners. More than once have we seen a speaker distracted in his attempt to hold the audience before him, while some platform guests of officious committee of arrangements were holding an animated conversation behind him. By all means, good friends, if you must talk on the platform while some one is speaking, do learn the art of whispering. We always wish that the same righteous retribution would come to such thoughtless people, which overtook the good lady at the concert, who in a high shrill tone of voice, while the orchestra was playing its loudest, was instructing her next neighborod the manufacture of doughnuts. Suddenly there came a lull in the music. The bass viol and the drum and the symbal and the clarionet all ceased; but the good lady was wound up on the subject of doughnuts and could not stop so suddenly, and greatly to her mortification and confusion of face, into the remotest corners of the hushed music hall floated the shrill sentence: "I fry mine in lard!"—Golden Rule.

The Echo Was There.

Talking about echoes, says the Savannah News, Col. Ogeechee claimed that he had one on his place, a few miles from Savannah, and that it beat anything he had ever heard or read about; it was one which would clearly repeat whole sentences. The party of gentlemen were interested, but incredulous, and arranged to accompany Col. Ogeechee home the next afternoon to test the wonderful echo.

The colonel found, on getting home, that in the heat of the discussion he had claimed more than the facts justified. Determined not to be beaten he called his Irish laborer.

"Pat," says he, "some gentlemen are coming home with me tomorrow afternoon to hear the echo. Now, I want you to go across the river before time for me to arrive, so you can answer back whatever we may call out."

"You mean for me to play ikker, sor?" asked Pat grinning.

"That's it, exactly," said the colonel. "Now, do you thoroughly understand that you are to answer back exactly what we say?"

"Oh, yis, sorr; ye can depind on me entoirely." Next afternoon the colonel took his friends to the river bank, and were all ready for the experiment.

"Are you there?"

Back came the echo with startling distinctness:

"Yes, sorr; Oi've been here since 4 av the clock."

"Can't I sell you a burglar alarm?" he asked of a householder in a neighborhood where a number of houses had been entered.

"No; I have no use for anything of that kind. My daughter has just become engaged and the young man calls every evening.

Baxter's Boys.

"Baxter's boys are a bad set."

This remark was made to me when old man Baxter was pointed out to me for the first time. Everybody had a good word for the father, but it was the unanimous verdict that the sons were fit only for the penitentiary and the gallows.

Of course I jumped to the conclusion that old man Baxter's hair was prematurely gray, and that the numerous lines graven deep in his face were stamped there by sorrow and care. As I began to know him better, his tender heart, his unfailing patience, and his sunny temper drew me to him, and I often found myself thinking bitterly and resentfully of his wicked boys.

Out of consideration for the old man I carefully avoided family topics, but one Sunday when I stopped to chat with him in front of his cottage, he suddenly remarked:

"I got a letter from Tom this morning."

"Tom?" I repeated inquiringly.

"Yes; one of my boys," was the reply; "but you are a new-comer here, so of course you never met Tom."

"No," I answered, in some embarrassment; "I hope he is well."

"Well enough, but in trouble," said Baxter, with a sigh. "I tell you the way that boy has been imposed on is a shame. He has had a run of bad luck all his life. You know they charged him with forging a check, and run him off from here?"

I told him that I had understood that there was some trouble.

"Yes, sir; it is a fact," continued my companion, indignantly. "And although I raised the money and settled the check matter, they actually indicted the lad, and he had to leave. He first went to Texas, but there were some bad fellows out there who wanted to get rid of him, and so they charged him with stealing a horse. I don't remember all the facts, but of course I know that he didn't intend to steal the animal. However, they had it their own way, and he had to get. Well, when he left there he went to Indian Territory, and now he writes me that he's hiding out from the United States marshals. Somebody's been imposing upon him again, I reckon."

Wishing to change the conversation I said something about taking a walk for my health.

"That was Jim's idea," said Mr. Baxter, with a pleased smile. "Jim's another son of mine," he explained, "You've heard of Jim?"

I admitted that I had heard of him, but I did not think it necessary to add that I had been told that he was a cold-blooded, murderous cut-throat.

"You ought to have Jim here to walk with you. But, Lord bless you, Jim wouldn't get along with these people. They were always after him."

"Imposing upon him?" I suggested.

"Yes, just so. Now Jim was a little how-come-you-so one day, and a barkeeper refused to sell him a drink. It was the meanest thing that a man could do under the circumstances, because the man might have known that Jim was bound to have his way. Well, Jim, he just pulled out his pistol and shot that barkeeper dead in his tracks, and helped himself to a drink. I advised the people not to make any fuss over it, as they all knew Jim and his peculiarities, but the devil got into them, and nothing would do but an inquest and all that sort of thing. So I mortgaged my house and let my boy have several hundred dollars, and he went off out west."

"Is he getting along well?" I asked.

"I'm afraid not. People don't understand Jim. Thy don't make allowances. He's as kind-hearted as a baby, but he won't be imposed upon. Once out in New Mexico Jim borrowed a man's tooth-brush, and when he returned it to him what do you think the fellow bid? Why, he actually threw it away. Yes, he did; he threw it away. Jim was in for peace, but he couldn't stand that. He drew his pistol and blew daylight through the man, and then he had to move again. I think he's gone to join Joe. Ever hear of Joe?"

I mumbled something non-committal.

"You ought to know Joe. He's as kind-hearted as Jim and as honest and true-hearted as Tom. But Joe's forgetful. That's the great drawback with Joe."

"Yes, that's what's the matter with Joe. People don't understand it, and so they've got him indicted in five states for bigamy."

"What has forgetfulness to do with that?" I asked.

"Why, sir, a great deal. You see, Joe travels a heap. Among new scenes and new acquaintances he forgets things. After being away from a wife several months he forgets all about being married, and so gets into a new entanglement. Instead of making allowances for him people get fighting mad and indict him for bigamy and nearly worry the life out of him. It's a mighty wicked world, anyhow."

"You have three boys, then?" said I preparing to walk on.

"Four, sir, four," replied the old man briskly. "There's Jerry, you know. Jerry, I think, is the best one of all. He's in the penitentiary now at Albany, but I think he'll be pardoned out. They can't be cruel enough to keep him there. The fact is he didn't do anything but kill a revenue officer, and everybody knows he wouldn't have done it if the officer hadn't been monkeying around his still. Oh! I think he'll get out soon."

I started to continue my walk, but old man Baxter held me back.

"You must drop in again," he said. "It's such a comfort to me to talk about my boys. They are the best and most affectionate sons a father ever had. you don't know how I love them. It is all that keeps me alive. Now, if I had bad, undutiful boys, such as some fathers are cursed with, I believe it would kill me. But it worries me to have the boys imposed upon by every body. That's my only trouble."

I tore myself away. Perhaps it is a blessed thing that old man Baxter can not see his boys as others see them. Perhaps, after all, his sons have some spark of goodness in them. —Atlanta Constitution.

An endless railway train, consisting of 400 platform cars, is to be one of the attractions at the Paris exhibition. The rails will be sunk so that the platforms will be on a level with the surface, and the train will run slowly enough to permit most people to step on and off while it is in motion, but, for the accommodation of elderly people, a stop of fifteen seconds every minute will be made. The motive power will be electricity.

Washington Happenings.

Gov. Caleb W. West of Utah, in his annual report to the secretary of the interior, notes the recent partial union of the Mormon and non-Mormon elements in the territory "with a view to advancing material interests," but remarks that the movement is largely due to the anxiety to secure the admission of the territory into the Union as a state. The governor finds that the chief objection to admitting Utah into statehood is that it would enthrone with sovereignty the power of the Mormon church, which is foreign to the spirit and genius of the institutions of the country. The governor asserts that he has no religious controversy with the mormons except as to the practice of polygamy, but in the Mormon policy now controlling the territory he notes the union of the church and the state. "The control of the priesthood, which wields a supreme power in all things, secular as well as spiritual," he adds, "is complete and absolute."

The Casualty Calendar.

Andrew C. Rogan, brakeman, was killed at Nora Junction, Iowa. He was found by the track, his head entirely severed from his body.

The Clyde line steamer Saginaw, while loading at her dock in the East river New York for the West Indies, listed and sunk. No lives were lost. The vessel will be raised.

James Ward, a trapeze performer at the London theater St. Louis, while going through his act fell from the trapeze and plunged downward into the orchestra chairs. His skull was fractured and he cannot live.

A man named Peter Dahl, from Rothsay, Minn., while under the influence of liquor, jumped from the west-bound passenger No. 3 near Livingston, Minn., and fell under the train, which severed both legs from the body. He will probably die. He leaves a wife and four children at Rothsay.

Two fatal accidents occurred at the What Cheer mines in Iowa. John Dixon, mine foreman, fell one hundred and twenty feet down a shaft and was dashed to pieces. Mrs. Coy, sixty years old, while holding a team for her son, who was loading coal, was trampled to death by the animals, who were frightened by a passing engine.

A big cave-in occurred over an abandoned mine of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western railroad at Curry Hill, Plymouth. The house of John Fox sank in the earth twelve feet. The inmates, six in number, were thrown out of bed and seriously injured in the wreck. Several other buildings were damaged. The cave-in covers an area of three acres. About one hundred people will have to vacate their homes immediately.

The large Howe iron-truss county bridge near Blairesville, sixteen miles from south of Duquoin, Ill., suddenly collapsed. The bridge was the largest of the kind in the state, 170 feet in the clear and 48 feet above high water, the one span reaching clear across Big Muddy river. A gang of men were at work repairing the flooring, and an order was given one of them to loosen a girder a fraction of an inch. The girder was one of the main supports, and one turn of the wrench swung the bridge out of plumb, the vast mass dropping to the water fifty feet below. William Thomas was instantly killed, and ten others fatally or seriously wounded.

A bad wreck occurred at Classil, a small section on the Northern Pacific about 12 miles east of Helena. The scene of the disaster is a deep cut where there is a long curve. One freight train was standing on the track and another plunged into its rear. A Chinaman had both legs cut off and will die. Two men named Frazier are in the Sisters' hospital, suffering from severe injuries, and two or three wounded train men were taken to the hospital at Missoula. One story as to the cause of the wreck is that the forward train had been standing on the main track for half an hour without sending out a flagman. Another is to the effect that the forward train was side-tracked, but that the switch was left open. The wreck is a bad one and passenger trains are delayed.

Petty Criminalities.

The east-bound passenger train of the Iron Mountain railroad was held up by train robbers two miles west of Newport, Ark. The passengers were robbed of about $200.

Andy Fulton, Ex-Mayor of Pittsburgh, who has a ranch 20 miles from Denver, Colorado, was shot and seriously wounded by his wife. Jealousy is said to be the cause.

A sensation was created in the criminal court room at Kansas City, by the suicide of Jack Fleming, a deputy marshal, who drew a revolver and blew his brains out while court was in session. No cause is assigned.

James Ressegue, who with Calvin Moore was arrested in a notorious district known as Toad-a-Loup, on the state line of Missouri has confessed to the charge of horse stealing. He also says that a plot had been made up by three men besides himself and Moore to rob the outgoing Santa Fe train.

G. P. Johnson was a prosperous druggist of Arlington, Kingsbury county, Dakota, but he sold liquor, and four indictments were found against him. He gave bonds in $200 each; and stayed at the old stand until recently, when he disappeared with his family. He checked out $6,000 of his money from the Arlington bank the day before.

Mrs. Anna Snoots, now under three indictments for murder in the first degree, for poisoning her children, was brought to Janesville, Wis., and lodged in jail with her baby. She has been out on $10,000 bail for over a year on two charges, but the grand jury indicted her again when an ounce of sulphate of copper was found in the remains of her baby that died five years ago. She will remain in jail until the trial occurs next month.

Judge Thomas of Algona, Iowa, passed judgment on A. S. Hawkes on his plea of guilty for arson and forgery. He got six years on the first and four on the last ten in all at Fort Madison. Joseph McGuire was sentenced for six months for assault with intent to commit robbery. Old man Carpenter, who gave forty-three mortgages on the same piece of property, and was indicted for obtaining money under false pretenses, pleaded guilty and was fined $1 and sentenced to thirty days in jail.

Advices from Bonny River, Africa, give a revolting story of savage atrocities and cannibalism. The Okrikan tribe, in revenge for some injury, invited a party of Ogonis to a friendly palaver, and then entrapped and massacred them. A cannibal festival of the most horrible and indescribable character followed. Then an attempt was made upon the undefended villages, and the most barbarous outrages were committed. It is estimated that over one hundred and fifty persons, including women and children, were killed and eaten.

Gustave Falk a native of Sweden, was arrested at Chicago charged with being a confederate in a gigantic mortgage swindle, whereby the Guaranty Association, of Stockholm, Sweden, is the loser to an enormous amount. In his sworn statement he says that in Stockholm there exists a gang of mortgage forgers and confidence operators who have swindled the banks for years; that they are extremely secretive and only communicative with each other by mail. He gave the names of his companions. He says that his share of the forgeries amounted to $4,500.

A party of prospectors, from Helena, Montana, headed by McDonald, the half-breed, who has induced the Flathead Indians to divulge a long-kept secret as to the location of some remarkably rich mines in the Blackfoot country, while clambering over the steep mountain side were horrified to find the skeletons of two white men. One had a bullet-hole through his forehead, and both had evidently been killed by hostile Indians. Beside the skeletons lay a small pile of quartz. Evidently they were the first prospectors and pioneers of the Blackfoot Hills, and for years had lain on the bare, bleak hillside. The discoveries made have caused a stampede to that section.

A riot in which thirty-five railroad men were involved occurred at the Air line bridge, Sixteenth street Chicago. A Burlington engine had the right of way on a switch, and this was disputed by the crew on the engine of another road. The dispute lasted some time. Seven Michigan Central, Rock Island, Northwestern and Burlington engines were blockaded in the meantime. The blockade culminated in a battle between the crews, the melee lasting about an hour. A number of the participants received severe bruises, and the riot might have resulted more seriously had not the yardmaster interfered and ordered the men back to their engines. The police were sent for, but when a large body of the officers arrived order had been restored and the blockade raised.

Nanticoke, Pa., was the scene of a romantic tragedy. Jos. Grasch, a young Hungarian, had been paying attention to a Polish girl named Pika. The married brothers of the girl, John and Joseph Pika, opposed Grasch's suit and the young couple planned an elopement. At 1 o'clock one morning Grasch came to the house and, raising a ladder to the window of the room occupied by the young lady, was assisting her to descend when they were discovered by the brothers. One of the brothers seized and held Grasch while the other struck him several blows with an axe, mangling him in a horrible manner. Grasch's ribs were broken and one of his ears cut off, as were several of his fingers. His body and limbs received terrible cuts. His death is momentarily expected. The two men escaped but were subsequently captured and placed in jail.

Talk About People.

At Winchester, Kentucky, Eli Perkins, the lecturer, stepped off the Chesapeake & Ohio train for lunch, and got into a quarrel with Andrew Mitchell, who owns the restaurant, over the inattention of the waiters. He called Mitchell an ugly name and was promptly knocked down, whereupon he retired to the cars.

Foreign Gleanings

The National Zeitung of Berlin says that Emperor William left the municipal delegation coolly. The usual presentation was ommitted, and his majesty did not shake hands with Mayor Ferckenberg. The government and opposition newspapers are mutually blaming each other for incurring the kaiser's anger.

A special to the New York World, from London says: The secretary of the Emin Bey relief expedition committee had received no news of the reported massacre of Stanley, and entirely discredits it. "But," he added, "if by the end of February Emin Pasha should send letters to Europe without announcing the arrival of Stanley at Wadelai, then we shall feel that there is reason to be anxious about his fate."

The railroad war was resumed in Manitoba by an attempt to burn a bridge of the Canadian Pacific railroad—southwestern branch—about twelve miles from Winnipeg. The bridge was saturated with oil and set on fire. Several of the beams had been burned when the fire was discovered and extinguished. The act was undoubtedly incendiary and is attributed to some person excited by the conflict now pending between the province and the railroad company. A gang of about two hundred men proceeded to the disputed crossing, and it is thought that an attempt will be made to force the right of way. The Canadian Pacific people are prepared to offer active resistance, and the militia are under orders. A meeting of the legislature has been called for Nov. 8, when it is proposed to enact retaliatory legislation by repealing the laws now exempting Canadian Pacific property from taxation.

The fact that Mr. Parnell's disclaimer of having sent the alleged check for £100 to Frank Byrne has not been included in the Irish leader's case against the Times in the Scotch courts has excited a good deal of comment, and will militate more against popular sympathy with him in England than anything the Times has embodied in its charges. Concerning this commission, Mr. Frank Lewis, Mr. Parnell's solicitor, said that the neglect to include his client's denial in the affidavits comprising his case was a complete surprise to himself, as well as to Mr. Parnell, who had written to his legal advisers in Edinburgh, and was impatiently awaiting an explanation. Of course, if the commission finds in favor of Mr. Parnell, little harm can be done by the ommission, since the decision of the three judges will practically establish a final verdict, but it is assumed that the strongest possible case should be made out in view of the possibility, not to say probability, that testimony may be forthcoming, the character of which neither party at the present moment has any knowledge of.

The whaling bark J. A. Howland arrived at San Francisco from Fox island to the Arctic ocean. She reports thirteen whalers in the ice, with little prospects of their getting out. Their names are: The Ocean, Hidalgo, J. P. West, Hunter, Eliza, Reindeer, Ohio, Rosario, Saucer, Sea Breeze, Andrew Hicks and William Bayliss.

Since Sparks was fired at the Huron land office there have been thousands of patents received at the Huron land office. But there are hundreds of proofs which he held up for various insignificant reasons that have not yet come to trial. Just that many settlers are kept in doubt as to the outcome of these suits, and as to whether they will be compelled to leave their lands or go through the tedious and expensive process of making new proof.

The Oregon Railway & Navigation Company has secured the right of way through the Coeur d' Alene Indian reservation in Idaho, which it has been trying hard to obtain for over a year. Many railroad men contend that this means another transcontinental line for Portland, the Manitoba system, with which the O. R. & N. Co's lines will connect in Montana. It has been supposed for a long time that Hill's lines would connect with the Seattle, Lake Shore & Eastern, but this has been denied. The building of the O. R. & N. line through the reservation means that the ore of the Coeur d' Alene mines will come to Portland for reduction.

The Canadian Pacific railroad obtained a great victory over the Northern Pacific in the courts at Winnipeg, when the judge rendered a decision granting an injunction restraining the latter from crossing the Canadian Pacific track. One of the grounds on which the injunction is granted is that the railway for which a crossing is desired is not being built by the Manitoba government, but is really the work of the Northern Pacific, which that company sought to disprove. The granting of an injunction is a severe setback to the government, as they are now powerless to do anything until the supreme court at Ottawa is appealed to. This is certain to cause long delay in building the new line, and puts the farmers of Manitoba at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific monopoly for at least another year. All danger of conflict is now over, and citizens sworn in by the government as special police have been discharged. Supt. Whyte, of the Canadian Pacific, says, however, that he will take no chance, and will continue to guard the track with a large force. It is estimated that it costs the Canadian Pacific over $2,000 a day to maintain its small army of specials.

Whalers to be Rescued.

Washington authorities received a long telegram from San Francisco, signed by Senator Hearst and others, informing them of the perilous situation of the crews of about a dozen whalers, supposed to have been wrecked near Herald Island, in the Arctic ocean, and asking that a revenue steamer be sent at once to their assistance. There are said to be nearly 500 men in the party, and they are in no condition to withstand the rigors of an Arctic winter. The revenue steamer Bear is desired for the purpose of sending them provisions and clothing, without which, it is said, they will perish of hunger and cold. Acting Secretary Thompson visited the White house, and laid the matter before the president, saying that there is no vessel now in the revenue service in fit condition for a winter cruise in the Arctic. The steamer Bear, now at San Francisco, which was suggested for the expedition, would require extensive repairs, and Mr. Thompson added that there is no appropriation which can be utilized for this expense. The president said that the case was a serious one, and required prompt action. He thereupon sent for Commodore Harmony, acting secretary of the navy, and instructed him to take immediate steps for the relief of the whalers. Commodore Harmony promised to do so, and said he would endeavor to communicate with Commander Emery, commanding the United States steamship Thetis, now cruising in the Arctic, and which is expected to arrive at San Francisco in a short time. The present plan is to fit this vessel out for a relief expedition as soon as she arrives at San Francisco, and to expedite her arrival there with that end in view.

Thanksgiving Day Designated.

President Cleveland issued the following proclamation:

Constant thanksgiving and gratitude are due from the American people to almighty God for his goodness and mercy which have followed them since the day he made them a nation and vouchsafed to them a free government. With loving kindness he has constantly led us in the way of prosperity and greatness. He has not visited with swift punishment our shortcomings, but with gracious care he has warned us of our dependence upon his forbearance, and has taught us that obedience to his holy law is the price of a continuance of his precious gifts. In acknowledgment of all that God has done for us as a nation, and to the end that on an appointed day the united prayers and praise of a grateful country may reach the throne of grace, I, Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 29th of November instant, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed throughout the land. On that day let all people suspend their ordinary work and occupations, and in their accustomed places of worship, with prayer and songs of praise, render thanks to God for all his mercies, for the abundant harvests which have rewarded the toil of the husbandman during the year that has passed, and for the rich rewards that have followed the labors of our people in their shops and their marts of trade and traffic. Let us give thanks for peace and for social order and contentment within our borders, and for our advancement in all that adds to national greatness. And mindful of the afflictive dispensation with which a portion of our land has been visited, let us, while we humble ourselves before the power of God, acknowledge his mercy in setting bounds to the deadly march of pestilence, and let our hearts be chastened by sympathy with our fellow countrymen who have suffered and who mourn. And as we return thanks for all blessings which we have received from the hands of our Heavenly Father, let us not forget that he has enjoined upon us charity; and this day of thanksgiving let us generously remember the poor and needy, so that our tribute of praise and gratitude may be acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Southerners after Cheap Money.

Clayton King, of Opelika, Ala., was in Newark, N. J., and, in fact, is there yet, detained at police headquarters. Mr. King, who is a small, dark complexioned man, with straggling black beard, restless dark eyes and a broad-brimmed black hat, arrived North at the invitation of some strangers, who offered to sell him $10 in greenbacks, which, they said, had leaked out of the engraving department at Washington, for one good dollar, which had not leaked out, but had come out in a legitimate manner. Mr. King said when arrested that it was not so much the offer of cheap money that tempted him as it was the offer that these good, kind gentlemen made to give him $1,000 in gold if he was not satisfied with the way they did business.

"I was after that $1,000," he said. I wa'n't gwine to be satisfied. I didn't want any counterfeit money."

Mr. Clayton King had with him a Southern friend named Henry Judson Skipper. He had also $250 in good money and several plugs of hard tobacco. The tobacco and the money were wrapped up in green and white striped paper, and the packages appeared identical from an external point of view. He had also a ferocious-looking revolver loaded with heavy cartridges. Skipper had six $20 gold pieces and $5 in loose change. They had an appointment to meet Charles McDonald, of Jersey city. Mr. McDonald was the benevolent gentleman who was to provide them with cheap money, surreptitiously procured from the treasury. At Washington they sent a telegram informing Mr. McDonald that they would be in the city at 12:30 and Mr. McDonald was waiting for them at the Pennsylvania depot in Jersey City. The meeting was observed by the detective employed by the railroad and the police notified. At the Park House the detectives swooped down upon the party and took the trio to police headquarters. McDonald was found to be provided with lithograph letters offering "green goods" and other material used in confidence operations of the kind. The police think that King and Skipper came determined to beat the confidence men at their own game and carry the good money off at the point of the pistol. McDonald's confederate escaped.

The Public Debt.

The reduction on the public debt during October amounted to $4,585,619, and for the first four months of the fiscal year $28,294,620. The net cash in the treasury today is $74,491,969, against $96,444,845 on Oct. 1. The gold fund balance in the treasury has decreased about $8,000,000 during the past month and today amounts to $191,074,575, and the silver fund balance, exclusive of $6,000,000 trade dollar bullion, is $24,566,259, or $10,000,000 less than a month ago. National bank depositories today hold $54,480,279, or about $3,000,000 less on Oct. 1. Government receipts during October were $31,966,203, against $31,803,172 in October 1887. Customs receipts during the part month were $17,832,261 or nearly 1,000,000 less than in October a year ago; internal revenue receipts were $11,500,000, or about $1,000,000 more than in October, 1887; while the receipts from miscellaneous sources were $2,565,000 or $100,000 less than in October a year ago. Receipts from all sources for the first four months of the present fiscal year reach $129,500,000, against $134,151,569 for the first four months of the preceding fiscal year, and as receipts in July, August, September and October are usually a little heavier than in any four months of a year, point to a revenue of about $375,000,000 for the year. Expenditures for the first four months of the current fiscal year amount to $110,500,000, against $100,500,000 for the first four months of the preceding fiscal year. During October, the past month, the department has purchased $28,650,000 bonds; $18,890,000 4½ and $9,700,000 fours, at a premium of $4,518,457.

James M. Eddy, of Rhode Island who has been digging for Capt. Kidd's treasure, and who turned up an iron kettle full of Spanish silver coins on the beach adjoining his farm opposite the summer resort, Westport, arrived at his home in Johnston with his wealth. He denies that his grandfather ever had anything to do with pirates or that his father ever told him of the buried treasure. He said that two years ago he became possessor of a piece of parchment, that apparently had served as a drum head, and which had been converted into a chart purporting to describe the location of three lots of buried gold, silver and other valuables cached by a pirate many years ago. The lines were drawn as though with a sharpened stick. On the chart were three points designating the burial places of the wealth. When this parchment was found, Eddy was confident it was a valuable document. He determined that no one should know of his plans, and without imparting a hint of what he was about, he began operations at the place indicated. His labors during the summer of 1887 were not rewarded, but during the past summer he continued his labors. He proceeded cautiously and patiently, and worked his way in the course directed, and at last made the discovery. He declares it will be an easy matter to find the balance of the wealth. One of the two discovered treasures is stated in the chart to be gold coin, and the other diamonds or jewelry. The unearthed treasure, Mr. Eddy says, will stay where it is until he gets ready to secure it. The dates on the silver range from 1781 to 1851, showing that it is not a part of Capt. Kidd's long-sought treasure. Mr. Eddy will not tell his theory, but says it is a pirate treasure.

Commits Suicide over his Wife's Grave.

John T. Bennett was found dead on the grave of his wife with his throat cut almost cut from ear to ear. Bennett was principle of the schools at Bloomsberry, Pa., and although quite young, was one of Bloomsberry's most trusted and honored citizens. Last winter he led to the alter Marie, the only daughter of Theodore Baker, a lady of many accomplishments. Some time ago the bride contracted a severe cold which gradually grew worse, and terminated in consumption. She died last week at the age of 22. Their residence was permanently closed and Bennett made his home with the Baker family. He was completely prostrated with grief and remarked to a friend that life was not worth living. One evening he appeared in better spirits and told the Baker family that he might visit his brother, who lived two miles away, and they shouldn't be alarmed if he did not return before morning. This was the last seen of him alive. At daylight next morning Mr. Baker and his son drove to the brother's house and learned that he had not been there. Joined by the brother they hastened back, and, after a brief search about town, drove to the cemetery, where, lying across the new made grave of his wife, the husband was found with a deep gash in his throat. A new Wade & Butcher razor, the instrument with which the deed was committed, was by his side, stained with blood.

Railway Building.

The Railway Age of Chicago gets the following resume of railroad construction during the year. "Few people have had any correct idea of the amount of railway construction which has been in progress in the United States during the present year. The impression which widely obtained at the commencement of the year that railway extension had been practically suspended and that 1888 would show very little addition of railway track, seems to have continued, although the statement published in this journal for the first six months showed that nearly 4,000 miles of track had been laid. The fact that the great companies which added thousands of miles of new road in 1887 practically ceased construction at the end of that year, for the time being, seemed to warrant the impression that railway building had practically come to a standstill. But while few of the principal companies have been doing much new building, still work has been quietly in progress on hundreds of short lines all over the land, and already new track has been laid this years in every one of the 47 states and territories with three exceptions, those of Rhode Island, Utah and Nevada, and almost 6,000 miles of main line have been added to the railway system of the country since the 1st of January last."

The schooner Mystic, which was thought to have been lost on Lake Michigan with the entire crew, has been heard from. She passed Eagle Harbor all safe.

The secretary of the navy is undergoing an experience seldom known among cabinet officers. One month ago the promotion of a typewriter and clerk in the bureau of steam engineering left a $900 vacancy to be filled. The civil service commission was called up to furnish a list of eligibles for the selection of a clerk to fill the place. The selection was made, but the appointee declined the office. Another and another declined. A telegraphic refusal was received from the twelfth appointee. A similar experience is being undergone in filling a position at $750 in the naval records office. Nine ladies have refused the appointment and the tenth has just been notified of her selection. The difficulty in both these cases seems to be with the salaries offered.

John Hayes of Duluth was shot at West Superior by Harry Barnett. Hayes had been in Barnett's employ and discharged. He met Mr. Barnett and threatened to "do him up." The later warned Hayes not to approach him, but Hayes did not heed the warning and Barnett drew the revolver and fired. The ball entered Hayes' abdomen, making a severe wound. Barnett was arrested and lodged in jail. He is the owner of the West Superior theater, and also has a theater in Duluth. Hayes is a well known sporting man.

The Manitoba mounted infantry militia are still stationed at Pembina crossing, although there appears to be no immediate danger of a conflict. The arrival of a large force of Northern Pacific graders from the Morris branch frightened the Canadian Pacific people one night, and caused the hurried march of troops to the scene. At a later hour a Northern Pacific train was accidentally backed into the Canadian Pacific locomotive, obstructing the line. This was regarded in a serious light by the Canadian Pacific, and additional troops were called out, but no blows were struck. Contractor's teams under contract of the Manitoba government at the front are working away. Some of them display the stars and stripes at the heads of their horses. The government men are all under the impression that an attempt will be made to convey an engine over the Canadian Pacific track. Grading on either side of the Canadian Pacific, presumably with this end in view, is now being rushed to completion. Supt. Whyte will resist any attempt to carry a locomotive over.

In a tavern opposite the Law Courts, in London, Joseph Kavanaugh drew a revolver and fired a shot at Blanche Cox. The shot did not take effect. Kavanaugh was arrested and committed to jail on the charge of attempted murder. It is reported that both Kavanaugh and Cox had been cited to appear as witnesses before the Parnell commission. A five-chambered revolver, with four of the chambers loaded, was found on Kavanaugh. He stated to the police that he carried the weapon for self-defense, as had been threatened with death for making certain disclosures.

The following order has been placed in the hands of every agent of the Maine Central railroad: Ticketing Chinese to or through Canada, under the recent act of congress, prohibiting the return to the United States of Chinese—no tickets should be sold these people over lines that pass through Canada, as once having been taken out of this country they cannot re-enter, and Canadian lines are prohibited by the Canadian government from landing any Chinese in that country under penalty.

A riot occurred at Carlisle, Pa., between the Dickinson college boys and the fireman of the city. The students tore down the fences surrounding the college and made a bonfire. The fire companies turned out but the students refused to admit them to the college ground. The fireman attached their hose to a plug and commenced throwing water on the fire and the students. The students grappled the nozzel and tried to wrench it from the fireman. The latter succeeded in retaining possession and threw more water on the students. A volley of stones was then thrown by the students injuring a number of fireman. The fireman returning a volley of stones and water. This affair has created a great deal of excitement and it is expected it will be carried to the courts. The college building had all the window panes broken by the water thrown by the fireman.

A special from Lake City, Col., says that all the buildings, including the immense hoisting works of Frank Hough was burned. The loss will reach many thousand dollars. The origin of the fire is unknown. The owners of the property are residents of London Eng.

While Sever Thorson's nine-year-old son was playing with a powder horn at his home in Manchester, some of the powder ignited, and was blown into the boys face, tearing off the flesh and greatly injuring him. It is believed that his eyesight can be saved.

The store of August Wendlandt, the leading hardware man of Good Thunder, is in the hands of the sheriff. The attachments so far served are small, but the lawyer for the plaintiffs say the total liabilities amount to $18,000 or $20,000. The assets are not known.

It now transpires that the man Anderson, so called, who has been giving an exhibition of his kill as a runner to the sporting fraternity at Faribault is none other than Prof. Bethune, the celebrated racer. The Faribault sporting men did not find it out until they lost about $400 on him a Waseca.

Miss Edith Annis, one of the teachers in the city schools of Albert Lea, in company with several other young ladies, ascended the tower of the new court house, and as they reached the highest point Miss Annis became dizzy and fell down the narrow stairs a distance of sixty feet, sustaining severe injuries about the head and face.

A Northern Pacific train leaving Duluth ran over a lad named Francis Fish in the Rice's point yard, near Duluth, cutting off one of his legs. He was, with other schoolboys, stealing a ride home. The train was backed up and the child taken home. His father is an engineer in a mill. The boy died the same night.

For years Jackson has been waiting for something to give her a start onward toward distinction and prosperity, waiting for something that would give her a place among the bright stars of cities that blossom and bloom on the western prairies, and now the unmistakable sounds of approaching prosperity and progress are heard, for the Salvation army is headed that way.

The foundation walls are about in for the new hotel which R. R. Wise of Minnewaukan, Dak., is building at Brainerd. Mr. Wise removes main part of the building from Minnewaukan, and it is ready for shipment. The building will be much larger than before, and will be of brick veneer, The hotel will be situated a little north and east of the original Headquarters hotel, which was destroyed by fire in 1882.

An accident occurred on the St. Paul & Duluth road, below Rush City. Section hands were fixing the track, and a number of rails were torn up. Flags were displayed, but at such a distance from the work that they were not noticed by the engineer of the gravel train, which ran into the place where the men were. The fireman jumped and escaped injury, while Engineer George Young went over with the engine, which turned two or three times, but he escaped serious injury.

Some unknown parties made away from Northfield with a team belonging to a livery man and since that time nothing definite has been heard of there whereabouts until the other day when Frank M. Truax, marshal of St. Paul Park, who has been hunting the thieves got on their track near Newport, and succeeded in capturing a man and a woman—ten miles from Northfield. The man gives his name as George Clark. The woman he claims, is his wife, and says they live in Minneapolis. It is supposed they were on their way to La Crosse. Mr. Truax gives it as his opinion that there is a gang of these perpetrators that may be revealed from the prisoner.

Mary Schreiner, of La Crosse, an eccentric woman and somewhat intemperate, took a dose of morphine, from the effect of which she died. She has caused a great deal of trouble by threatening to kill persons and burn the property of those who offended her. She has been married, but her husband procured a divorce.

It has been decided to send a naval vessel to the relief of missing whalers; but the officials of the revenue marine service who have paid the most attention to Arctic matters are very apprehensive that the whalers cannot be found. It is quite possible that the Thetis will not leave San Francisco until the arrival in Washington of one of the captains of the revenue marine service who has a large experience in the waters where the whalers have been overtaken in the ice. He is expected to arrive at the treasury department in a few days direct from San Francisco. The authorities of his department are hopeful that he may bring information which will be of advantage; although there is but the faintest hope that anything that can be done that will be of avail.

A Queer Check.

From the Washington Star.

The following is a true copy of a check drawn on a West Washington bank sixty-four years ago, and shows how banking business was conducted in those days. The check was drawn by a citizen to pay the judgment in favor of a man whom he had cowhided:

$264.37.] GEORGETOWN, June 18, 1824.

Cashier of the Union Bank of Georgetown pay the bearer Two hundred & sixty-four dollars & and thirty-seven cents, it being the amount of a Judgment for cost and damages against me for cowhiding a miscreant by the name of ———. This judgment was obtained by the assassin-like midnight's work of imps and the aid of his associates. This will supply the Puppy with the means of giving a few more Rich Dinners to those who combined with himself to persecute and wrong me out of this money. May a Just God in due time smite and prostrate these vile Hypocrites, and let each morsel they eat at the table of this degraded wretch prove a dose of Gall & Wormwood until they are brought to repentance for their iniquity. It is reported a part of this money is to be a donation to the Female Orphan Asylum of Georgetown; by that means this condemned wretch expects to keep from sinking in public estimation. Can it be possible? (I hope not) that the guardians of that institution would receive from this miscreant a donation of money received in this way, when it is well known he is this day largely indebted to many respectable persons in the town, who he has, in some instances entirely ruined by taking the benefit of the Bankrupt Law, and is now living in greater affluence than any other person in this town. Not only that but he once before failed and ran off from Boston, indebted to an immense amount, which he still is indebted for. This is the fellow who now come out to make donations to the Female Orphan Asylum of Georgetown. I pray the guardians may not receive a curse of this kind; look only to virtue and aid will come from honest sources.

Eighty Miles An Hour.

Chicago, among other curiosities peculiar to her, is shortly to have the largest and fastest passenger locomotive ever constructed, which will surpass in every way anything hitherto attempted in its way. This wonderful engine, designed by G. S. Strong, of New York, has just been completed at Boston for the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroad, and when shipped West will be used for hauling the vestibuled train between Chicago and Ft. Madison.

It has a double fire-box, with a heating surface of 1,650 square feet, possessing 300 flues. Its cylinder is 19x24 inches, and with driving-wheels 80 inches in diameter is expected to haul 10 cars over an ordinary road at the rate of 80 miles an hour.

All the wheels are of paper, with steel tires. A new feature introduced into the construction is the steam pump, which so works that a great part of the exhausted steam is pumped back and serves to heat the water in the tank before it goes into the boiler, thereby saving a great deal of fuel.

Another economy in fêlu is the work of a large combustion chamber in connection with the fire-box, which burns up all the smoke and gas instead of letting it escape by the stack. The boiler, instead of being built with stay-bolt, is heavily corrugated on the inside.

The first thing observable is the singular position of the engineer's cab, which is perched up on top of the boiler about the center, and is occupied by the engineer alone, as another cab built behind the boiler is provided for the fireman. In each is a perfect system of gauges to keep track of the steam power.

The engine alone will weigh 55 tons, and with the tender, which is built to ride like a passenger coach, will weigh 85 tons. The engineer who was selected to sit up in the new cab and run this new contrivance is G. S. McKee, of Chicago. He is in Boston at present, and is being made perfectly acquainted with all its mechanism. He expresses delight over the machine and is most anxious to have her in service. It has been named the A. G, Darwin, after the president of the company designing it, and will leave for Chicago next week.

Early Days Of Railroading

General, Horace Porter, in Scribner.

When we picture the surroundings of the traveler upon railways during the first ten or fifteen years of their existence, we find his journey was not one to be envied. He was jammed into a narrow seat with a stiff back, the deck of the car was low and flat and ventilation in winter impossible. The springs of the car were hard, the jolting intolerable, the windows rattled like those of the modern omnibus and conversation was a luxury that could be indulged in only by those of recognized superiority in lung power. The brakes were clumsy and of little service. The ends of the flat bar rails were cut diagonally, so that when laid down they would lap and form a smoother joint. Occasionally they became sprung; the spikes would not hold and the end of the rail with its sharp point rose high enough for the wheel to run under it, rip it loose and send the pointed end through the floor of the car. This was called a "snake's head," and the unlucky being sitting over it was likely to be impaled against the roof. So that the traveler of the, bay, in addition to his other miseries, was in momentary apprehension of being spitted like a Christmas turkey.

It is said that Sir Walter Scott, who liked a joke with his friends, met one day a half-witted fellow, who lived near Abbotsford, and said to him, "Sandy, I'll gi'e ye a thousand pounds if you let me kill you." "Na, na, Sir Walter," replied Sandy; "but I'll compromise wi' ye, and let ye half kill me for half the money."

TIRED.

EVA P. KITCHELL.

I am so tired to-day:
I long to lay
My head, for rest, upon the pillow green,
Of some still church-yard grave, and shut me in
From all the cares, the worries, and the strife
Of all this anxious, restless mother-life,
And sleep, please God, for aye.

Ah! Little children, with your dancing feet
And glances sweet!
I have so weary of my burdens grown,
I fain would loose your fingers from my own,
And leave to other hands the dear delight
Of guiding baby-footsteps up the height,
And thus my task complete.

But, weary mothers, would I have it so?
Would I? Ah! no.
I could not sleep within my grassy bed
For hearing pattering footsteps overhead.
This mother-heart; though turned to dust, would throb
Responsive to the baby's lonely sob,
However faint and low.

And so I could not rest me after all;
The grasses tall
And snowy daisies could not bring me peace;
The aching mother love would never cease,
Oh! Christ, who gave this love with motherhood,
On mothers tired bestow this greater good,
Patience—whate'er befall!

The Last Slave Cargo.

From the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle.

Probably the most interesting character hereabouts is a negro man who was one of the cargo of the Wanderer, the last slave ship to bring to this country a load of captives from Africa. Lucius Williams, as he was christened by one of the young ladies of the family into which he was sold, or "Umwalla," as he was called in Africa, lives in a small hut on the outskirts of Hamburg, across the river from here. Since freedom he has earned a livelihood working gardens, sawing wood and whitewashing. He was a little surprised when asked about his early life, but talks well, once he has begun, requiring to be questioned frequently, however. As Umwalla, he was born in Guinea, according to his story, not far from Liberia. One day, when he was about ten years of age, he was sent to his aunt to carry her some pinders to plant. When he was going through the woods two strange black men seized him and bound his hands. He cried terribly, and they soon gagged him. They sold him to a native, who took him to Liberia. There, for the first time in his life, he saw a white man, and he was terribly frightened at him.

Umwalla was then taken to the Wanderer, where a large number of captives had already seen stored away in the hold. The passage over was fraught with untold terrors to the young savage. A storm was encountered, and for days the hold was fastened up, and numbers of the negroes died from sickness caused by the foul air. There were a number of ferocious men among the cargo who had to be kept in chains.

When the Wanderer approached the South Carolina coast she was sighted by a Government boat and given chase. During the night she dropped anchor off Pocataligo, and the cargo of negro men and women was debarked.

Umwalla, or, as he was soon afterwards called, Lucius, was taken to a Carolina plantation, near Beech Island, and put to work there.

Lucius is very fond of the "white folks," as he styles the family of his old master and mistress, and frequently calls to see them—walking several miles to do so. The style of punishment followed among his tribe was to break the culprit's neck by a sudden wrench from a forked stick.

Lucius tells, in his quaint way, of the interesting features of slavery. No negro woman was permitted, however gorgeous her toilet otherwise, to wear a veil or gloves. Negro men were neither permitted to carry a walking-cane nor smoke a cigar on the streets. They could not remain away from their quarters after 9 o'clock at night without a permit from their master.

He is not lonesome here, for on a neighboring plantation—on Capt. Ben Tillman's place—are many negroes from his old home, and they frequently meet and converse in African. They do not attempt to impart the language to their children, he says, and of course all vestiges of it, save what they have engrafted on the southern patois, must soon die out.

Reformed, But Fell Again.

From the New York Telegram.

"I was interested in the story of the man who drank the pickled tropical spiders," said a West 42d street physician recently,

"I could tell you some queer stories about the freaks the alcohol habit plays with a man.

"One of the oddest concerns a Virginia gentleman, an intimate friend of mine in the years I spent in Richmond 'befo' de wah;' A capital fellow, but he was going to the dogs as fast as possible through his appetite for liquor.

"His wife was in despair, and came to me to know what she should do. I fixed up a dose as nauseous as I could make it and told her to put that in his drink, He kept all sorts of wines and liquors at home, like most planters in those days, but she knew his favorite decoctions and managed to get the dose well distributed in them—trust a woman for anything like that!

"When he came to mix his morning dram the next day he went into a terrible splutter, but he tried one thing after another, and when he found everything tasted the same way he was scared, thought he was in for a fit of sickness; and so he was, for he'd got enough of the dose by that time to upset a sheet iron stomach. I didn't count, you see, on his helping himself quite so liberally.

"It was two or three weeks before I pulled him through, but he came out a new man, the very thought of liquor in any form gave him such a turn that he couldn't be induced to touch it. He even ordered all his stock of liquors emptied into the river, but from the number of darkies who were also taken down with the same mysterious illness just then I surmised that the river didn't catch much of my mixture.

"Well, sir, for fifteen years that man never touched a drop, went through the war without drinking, thoroughly reformed, wasn't a man in the community more respected. His wife and I felt pretty happy over it, I can tell you; but one day—I reckon she thought he was safe then, and would appreciate what we'd done for him and be ever grateful to her for her part in the fraud—she up and told him all about it.

"But, bless you! he was so mad at being fooled, he went right off and got drunk as a lord. He scarcely drew a sober breath after that, broke his wife's heart, and died a drunkard.

"A curious part of this story is that it is true as gospel."

Perpetual Motion.

A city man who had been informed that there was a piece of mechanism purporting to be a perpetual motion in existence at Lyons, wayne county, made a visit to the town a day or two ago to satisfy his curiosity on the subject. On his return he said: "I can not say 'I came, I saw, I conquered,' for to tell you the truth I was unable to discover how the machine does what I saw it do, but that there is some trick about it I am satisfied. Still as a mechanical curiosity the contrivance ought to pay in a dime museum. I went down to Lyons and after a little search found David Jennings, a man about 40 years old, the inventor of the motor, or whatever you would call it. I made known my wish to see his machine, and after a little parley he consented to give me a view of it, prefacing his consent by stating that it was taken apart and would have to be connected before it would work. We went to his house, in the yard back of which stands a workshop containing the motor. Every door of the shop was locked, and as its owner produced a key to the front door he advised me that I could go in the back way with less trouble than by the front, as I would have to climb a ladder in the latter case. He opened the back door from the inside and I was ushered into a room twenty feet square, fitted up like a carpenter shop, with various tools lying around. The apparatus I came to see was attached to a bench and consisted of a chain about five feet long made of peculiarly shaped links that could easily be described without a drawing. One of the links was out of place and the inventor proceeded to put it in order. When that was done the contrivance was ready for exhibition. The chain ran over three rollers that formed a vertical triangle, one side of which was perpendicular. The chain was so constructed that in running between the rollers that were vertical the links had a movement by which they closed together so that in the space of a foot there would be one or two more links than in the same distance when the links were extended. There would consequently be a greater weight in the vertical line in an equal distance than in any other place in the chain. It was on this difference in weight that Mr. Jennings said the power of the machine depended. One of the pulleys over which the chain ran was connected with a brake-wheel by which the motion of the chain could be stopped by applying the brake. After the train was connected and the brake taken off, the chain began to run around the pulleys as though it had an inherent motion. The pulleys over which it ran were set on rollers that reduced the friction to the minimum, but the force of the machine was only a trifle, as I could stay it with my fingers. The chain seemed to carry itself around the triangle continuously, but I noticed that Jennings would not let me take hold of the brake, and I half suspect that it had something to do with the constant motion of the chain, which apparently moved in defiance of the laws of gravity. If I had been allowed to closely examine the whole thing I am satisfied that I could have discovered the secret of its action. But I admit that it is a well-contrived device to catch the eye and deceive the unskillful into the belief that it is a perpetual motion. Jennings told me that he had spent $50,000 on the invention, and had been working at it for twenty-one years. The machine he has in Lyons is the 102d one he has built, and he is not satisfied with it.

"If you ask Jennings for an explanation of the working of the contrivance, his answers are not clear. He talks about the 'surplus power' in the 'double chain' and the 'mechanical construction of the links' in a way that makes me think he is not informed on the laws of mechanics or is trying to deceive the visitor by the use of jargon that sounds learned but means nothing."—Rochester Post-Express.

A Surgical Marvel.

A startling advance in surgical science has been made by Dr. Maximilian Klien, a German military surgeon. The particulars are given by the professional journal, Memorabilien. A man accidentally cut off his left great toe in the middle of the first joint. The severed piece remained hanging to the foot, but the connecting skin was scarcely thicker than a thread. Dr. Klein sewed on the fragment, dressed it with iodoform, and had the satisfaction in twenty-two days of finding the wound healed and the toe sound and flexible. Encouraged by the unexpected result in this case, Dr. Klein was induced to apply the treatment again. A rercuit, in order to disable himself and so escape from military service, deliberately cut off his forefinger with an axe at the second joint. The finger end was lost and could not be found until half an hour had elapsed. It was cold and blue. Nevertheless, Dr. Klein sewed it to the stump and applied a bandage of idoform gauze. As early as the second day it was evident that circulation had been partially re-established throughout the finger, and in six weeks the man had not only left the hospital, but was doing the very rifle drill which he had hoped to shirk. The finger was in fact as serviceable as it had ever been.

American Politeness.

The passenger in the crowded street railway car is often disturbed by the conscious absorbtion of his masculine neighbors in their newspapers when a woman enters and looks for a seat. If she be young and pretty, there are apparantly seats enough, however great the crowd, and even if a man is slow to rise, he may yet, with Mr. Readywit, exhort his son sitting upon his knee to get up and give the lady his seat. The impatient passenger, in his indignation at the want of courtesy upon the part of others, sometimes forgets, indeed, to rise himself. But there is always some Nathan comfortably seated farther away whose amused look says to the impatient but stationary David, "Thou art the man."

It would be very unfair to generalize from this frequent situation that the American is uncourteous. On the contrary, he is the most truly polite man among men of all nations. Lady Mavourneen, who is familiar with the society and the manners of many countries, and who has been always accustomed to hear Americans in Europe described everywhere and with pungent emphasis as "those Americans," were amazed upon coming here to find universal courtesy. "In the street or at the railway station," she said, "If I ask anybody any question, I receive the most prompt and polite reply. Everybody is at my service, not with much bowing or flourishing, but heartily and honestly. I have never seen such universal courtesy." When she was asked whether she had observed the absorption of the street car passengers in their newspapers, she smiled and said that she had never been obliged to stand, because some one was sure to rise. But in Paris she said that often as she was passing to a seat Monsieur Crapeaud, raising his hat politely, and saying warmly, Pardon! pressed by and secured the seat.

Lady Mavourneen, who tells a little story with great humor, described a scene in a crowded church in Paris. An apparent lady was disturbing everybody by pushing along toward a distant chair in the row, when Lady Mavourneen arose to allow her to pass more easily, and the apparent lady immediately slipped into my lady's chair, and held it fast, saying only, "Madame, you left the chair; I took it. You have lost it. Voila!" A vagabond of this kind took the seat of a gentleman who had risen to help a lady off a street car. When the gentlemen returned he mentioned to the interloper that it was his seat when he took it, and that he should continue to occupy it. "If you don't get out of that seat I'll take you out," was the rejoinder; and the squatter scowled and abdicated.

Lady Mavourneen found, what every lady will find, that she could travel everywhere in "the States" alone, with entire safety and surrounded by the utmost courtesy. The word "lady" with which she will be accosted by hackmen and porters and conductors is spoken with kindly respect, and even if some person in a lady's garb thrusts herself into the cue of passengers slowly advancing to the window of the ticket office to buy tickets, there may be sour looks and amazed stares, but she will generally have her way. So great is our courtesy that we honor the counterfeit claim. The source of the most serious objection to the demand of suffrage for women is the secret apprehension that men will lose their sincere deference, and treat women as they treat other men, thus robbing life of the tender romance of chivalric courtesy. Emerson says of the successful lover and his mistress, "She was heaven, while he pursued her as a star; can she be heaven if sha stoops to such a one as he?"

Yet, while this feeling is frequent, and seems to many very plausible, it is the true respect of the American for women which is the real strength of this very movement. The European sentiment for women is still somewhat mediæval. She is still the goddess of the troubadours and the minnesingers, but a goddess who is treated as the South-sea Islanders treat their gods, beating them when they are not propitious. To the American she is Wordsworth's "Phantom of Delight" seen upon nearer view, and it is idle to prettle about her "sphere," as if she did not instinctively know it more truly than men. The universal courtesy which Lady Mavourneen remarked is essential respect and kindliness of feeling, which no more permits a man to gild his selfishness with a "Pardon" and a touching of his hat than it permits him to strike a woman.

Yet although courtesy is essentially in the heart, and is kind feeling rather than respectful manner, it is not worth while to despise the manner. If we must choose between the good heart and suavity of address, besween Boythorne and Lovelace, of course we shall choose Boythorne. But why not both? Why not the mens sana in corpore sano?

The young American of to-day puffs his cigarette in the face of his partner on the balcony, in the boat, or in the wagon, and smiles at the frilled Lothario of yesterday bowing in his flowered coat and paying stately compliments as stiff as her brocade to the dame whom he addresses. The youth is right in saying that the flowered coat and the stately compliment were the dress and the speech of an old sinner. But he would be right also if he remembered that familiarity breeds contempt, and that he may wisely distrust his feeling for any woman who does not put him upon his good behavoir. The courtesy which Lady Mavoureen observed in the railway station and in the street was plain, but is was genuine. Respect naturally produces courtesy. Good manners are the cultivation of natural courtesy; the gift and the grace of the gift—George William Curtis, in Harper's Magazine.

The Journal of Reconstruction states that an infant loses from three to six ounces in weight during the first four to six days after birth; by the seventh day it should have regained its birth weight; from that to fifth month it ought to gain about five ounces per week, or about six drams a day; after the fifth month, about four drams a day; at the fifth month it ought to have doubled its birth-weight, and in sixteen months quadrupled it.

Dear Sir:—In April, 1885, while thinking of taking orders in September, I suddenly received notice that my ordination examination would be held in a fortnight. I had only ten (10) days in which to prepare for the Exam. I should recommend a year's preparation in the case of anyone so utterly unprepared as I was; but your system had so strengthened my natural memory, that I was able to remember and give the gist of any book after reading it once. I therefore read Lightfoot, Proctor, Harold, Browne, Mosheim, &c., &c., once, and was successful in every one of the nine papers. The present Bishop of Edinburg knows the facts. Faithfully yours.

A SONG OF REST.

O weary Hands! that all the day
Were set to labor hard and long
Now softly fall the shadows gray,
The bells are rung for even song.
An hour ago the golden sun
Sank slowly down into the west;
Poor, weary Hands, your toil is done;
'Tis time for rest! 'tis time for rest!

O weary Feet! that many a mile
Have trudged along a stony way
—At last ye reach the trysting stile;
No longer fear to go astray.
The gently bending rus'ling trees
Rock the young birds within the nest,
And softly sings the quiet breeze:
"'Tis time for rest!—'tis time for rest!"

O weary Eyes! from which the tears
Fell many a time like thunder rain—
O weary Heart, that through the years
Beat with such bitter, restless pain,
To-night forget the stormy strife,
And know what heaven shall send is best;
Lay down the tangled web of life;
'Tis time to rest!—'tis time for rest!
Florence Tyle in Chambers' Magazine.

LOTTIE REXDAL.

FROM THE YANKEE BLADE

"Marry you? Why, no Vane, of course I won't! Your senses must have gone wool-gathering. I always told you that I intended to wed a man with blue eyes; and with hair and mustache of the 'celestial rosy,' and you are dark. Besides, you are twenty-six years old and a theological student—two things I never could tolerate in the man I shall honor(?) with my hand and heart."

Lovely Lottie Rexdal gave a very wicked little laugh as she pushed the end of her red silk parasol into the mellow soil under the apple tree, at the same time glancing saucily up at her companion, a scholarly young man.

"Why did you ask me?" she resumed.

"Because I wanted to be made fun of, to be ridiculed by the little maiden I love so hopelessly," replied Vane Winton, smiling sadly at the piquant young lady perched on the back of an old rustic garden seat, her brown frizzes falling roguishly into her dancing brown eyes.

"Now that doesn't sound one bit like our Vane, who studies the good book and cultivates an ice-cream complexion," flashed Lottie, digging vigorously with the end of her parasol in the dirt.

"An ice-cream complexion?" repeated Vane, a little mystified at the unheard-of term.

"Yes, that's Lottie Rexdal's term for students' complexions such as yours. Vane, you are such an old bookworm, you shut yourself up with your big musty volumes, until your face is just the color of ice-cream," and a mischievous smile illumined the pretty face.

"If you would only be grave for a while, Lottie, I might talk to you," pleaded Vane.

"Yes; but just be merciful enough to consider that there is not a thimbleful of gravity in me, Vane. When you become a regular divine I should get you into all sorts of scrapes, and your clerical friends would shun you in consequence of your display of depraved judgement in the selection of a wife."

"If I am willing to run the risk, what difference will it be to them?" said Vane, giving the best reason his irritated mind affordad at that moment.

"Ah! but I am not. Marry some steady, sensible girl. Alice May will be here to visit your mother in an hour. Lay aside your extreme bookishness, be half-way polite, and you may captivate her. Miss May is highly cultured, not addicted to such frivolities as skating rinks, etc., as I am. She will not be less than sublime in your eyes. And Vane—"

But Vane Winton did not wait to hear more. He walked off, leaving Lottie Rexdal laughing merrily.

Lottie was the ward of Vane Winton's kind old father.

She had been left an orphan at a very early age. A maiden aunt had then taken care of her. When she was but ten her relative died. Before her death the maiden aunt sent for Mr. Winton, her girlhood's lover, and secured his promise to care for the orphan girl. Mr. Winton had brought Lottie to her present home, and the kind old folks had always petted and humored her beyond measure.

Vane was the only child of wealthy parents. When Lottie had come to live with them he was in Europe finishing his education. When he returned three years later he found his "ward-sister," as he had named her in his letters, away at some school for girls.

It so happened that Vane and Lottie had never met until the latter was seventeen, Vane having been traveling in various parts of the United States during Lottie's vacations.

Vane Winton was a fine scholar, but had never studied any profession. Now, at the age of twenty-six, realizing, perhaps, that a life of idleness would never suit him, he was studying for the ministry.

Vane found it almost impossible some days to devote his mind to theology amidst the tempest which the little whirlwind, Lottie Rexdal, stirred up. She threw open the unused piano ane made the room re-echo with her clear, bell-like notes. She filled the library with flowers and nondescript specimens which she had found in the woods or on the mountains near. She tossed up Vane's big books in a "dreadful manner," and even scribbled on one of his embryo sermons. She rode every horse on the place, romped with Prince, the great shaggy Newfoundland, tore her dresses shockingly, went bare-headed until she was brown as a chestnut, and turned the wide halls into a skating rink—that nerve-annoying invention of the present age.

Lottie was utterly spoiled by both Mr. and Mrs. Winton. At first, Vane had been shocked at her hoydenish ways.

But the more he studied her original character, the greater he became reconciled to Lottie's moods. Tolerance gave place to admiration, and that, in time, to love.

Vane Winton had always longed to discover a woman in whose character he hoped to find originality and freedom from affectation and deceit. In Lottie he believed he had found, not his ideal exactly, but the elements out of which to mold it. Could he only teach Lottie to love him, what a splendid woman she might become!

He would wait patiently and hopefully, he told himself, as he walked away from the incorrigible object of his heart.

Taking a copy of Talmage's sermons from his pocket, Vane sat down on a bench under an elm and commenced its persual.

Soon a merry laugh caused him to lift his eyes. He saw Lottie riding down the maple shaded lane on her milk-white pony, Floss. Very bright and saucy she looked in her navy-blue riding habit and jaunty hat with its drooping plume, as she drew rein beside him.

"Sir Owl, I am on my way to meet Alice now; and while I am gone I shall expect you to 'fix up.' In other words, put on a clean collar, part your hair in the middle, pin a sunflower in your button-hole, and endeavor to assume the aesthetic aspect of the delightful dude of the nineteenth century." And with another gay laugh, the vivacious fay vanished, like a meteor, in a cloud of dust down the road.

Vane devoted himself almost entirely to Miss May, leaving Lottie to amuse herself or seek the society of the guests, which the gay girl did not much relish as she disliked highly all tendency to tight-laced decorum.

They had frequent picnics in the grove near the Winton home, at which Alice always shone as the "bright particular star." She would return, after being gone all day, with her elegant costume as fresh and unrumpled as when she started; while Lottie would lose her fan and parasol, wade in the brook, get her dress torn and soiled and come home looking like a fright, with her face and hands as dark as a Mexican's, compared with the fair, composed Alice May.

When they went riding Lottie would make Floss perform such daring pranks as jumping wide ditches, leaping fences, etc., thus provoking earnest remonstrances from Vane and Alice. Then the brown-eyed witch would ride more recklessly than ever, sending back ringing peals of laughter to the dignified couple whom she left to bring up the rear.

Of late Vane thought he detected a sort of recklessness in Lottie's freaks. When going up the mountain, where it was dangerously steep, Vane dismounted to lead Miss May's horse, telling Lottie not to attempt an ascent until he came to her assistance. But she scorned his command. Putting her whip to Floss, she galloped past them, like a violent wind, on up the rocky height, tearing up pebble and turf, over wild chasms and along narrow ledges, when a single misstep would have sent pony and rider down, down to instant, awful destruction. Vane had trembled fairly. To screen his fears, though, he had given Alice his entire attention. When they reached the girl at the top of the mountain, traces of tears might have been seen in the brown eyes. But she kept her face turned carefully away from both Vane and Alice.

"Lottie, why will you ride so recklessly, endanger your life and cause us such wild apprensions?" was Miss May's interrogative reprimand.

The girl who had given her companions such a fright over her mad equestrian performances shot a swift glance at Vane, sitting pale but self-possessed on his horse, as she gaily replied:

"Have no direful forebodings on my account, good folks. I'm in league with the fairies, hob-goblins, etc., who live among those handsome mountain ferns, and they will not permit me to come to the least harm even if I wanted to do so."

"Please do be more careful of yourself hereafter, Lottie," spoke Vane for the first time, looking tenderly at the cause of all their present anxieties.

"Oh, well, I'll try to be, Vane. But you know its impossible for me to curb myself by the rules which poky humanity goes by. I always did love a tear of a ride!" she said, glancing up.

"Why, Lottie, there are tears in your eyes. Have we scolded your little apisode too harshly?" put in Alice's gentle voice, catching sight of Lottie's tear dimmed eyes for the first time.

"A grape vine struck me in the eyes as I rode along," dissimulated Lottie, subjecting each of her visual organs to a vigorous rubbing of her chubby brown fists.

"Poor child!" said Vane, gently, "you have been punished enough without our reprimands. But let us descend now."

"Just as though it were something very serious!" laughed Lottie, as they started homeward.

That evening Vane spent in the parlor, turning Alice May's music and listening to her low but exceedingly sweet voice. Lottie looked on and sighed from her corner of the room. Vane did not approach her once within the evening. The next morning Vane found Lottie in the parlor, seated on the window-sill. A magazine lay unnoticed in her lap. She was quietly watching Alice May, who, book in hand, was promenading slowly up and down the avenue of shady trees in plain view from the library. "Is she not beautiful?" said Vane, following Lottie's gaze out of the window, where Alice's graceful figure arrayed in the daintiest of pink lawn, could be seen walking backward and forward.

"I cordially agree with you this time," said Lottie.

"I wonder if she would marry me?"

"Why, Vane Winton how slow you are! You haven't asked her yet?"

"Not yet he answered. The fact is the refusal one of her sex gave me, has made me fear a similar termination of my suit."

"Fie! All women are not alike. Alice is noble and true. Don't be stupid enought to contrast her with a rattle-brain like me," responded Lottie, forcing a laugh.

"Well, we shall see. I shall, perhaps, lay my heart at her feet to-day. Do you think I'd better?" he asked; and a teasing smile lurked in the corner of his fine eyes. Lottie did not perceive it, however. She was looking away. She would not allow her eyes to encounter those of Vane Winton. "Most certainly, if you think you are old enough," was her mocking reply, as she fled from the room, singing at the top of her young voice.

Not long after, she was tearing down the road on Floss, at a speed that fairly deprived Alice May of her breath as she looked in the direction of the vanishing girl and pony.

In a short time Vane joined Alice under the trees.

"Vane what can ail Lottie?" Alice inquired.

"Ail Lottie?" he repeated quickly. "I do not understand you, Alice."

"A short time ago, she came flying out of the house on her way to mount Floss. In sport, I caught her and told her not to hurry off from good company so fast. Her face flamed with indignation, and she said sharply: 'Alice May, let me go. I want to get away from you all!' and I observed tears in her eyes. Then she rode off so wildly, I am fearful Floss may catch her mistress' spirit and behave rudely as she can when in an ill temper," answered Alice May.

Alice spoke somewhat seriously. Vane's face grew pale as he pictured Lottie's reckless freaks on Floss. But he tried to dismiss his uneasiness in discussing the book Alice had been reading. Presently they caught sight of Floss being led back by a strange man. Lottie was not in the saddle. What had happened? was the mute question their pale lips refused to articulate.

Very soon a carriage came in sight. In it sat two men, one of whom supported a girlish figure in his arms.

"It took place down the river road," explained one of the men to Vane who had hurried out wild to claim his darling capricious Lottie dead or alive. "The girl was riding like wildfire, when all at once the pony plunged and reared on its hind legs and the girl landed among the rocks."

"I do not think she is hurt dangerously," added the man who had held her, by way of consolation to Vane, who had snatched her up in his strong arms.

Mr. and Mrs. Winton, with Alice, came hurrying upon the scene, and great excitement prevailed.

Vane carried Lottie into the house and laid her on the easy lounge in Mrs. Winton's room. Here it was shortly ascertained that one arm was broken, while she had received numerous cuts and bruises. But the doctor informed them to be of good cheer, for Lottie would be her own gay self in a few weeks.

When Lottie was in a convalescent state, Vane came in to see her. As he approached her chair, she opened her eyes which had been closed.

"Go away, Vane," she cried, spiritedly.

"Never, my little madcap, for I love you!"

"Pshaw! how can the fastidious Vane Winton condescent to love a girl with a quarter-section of court-plaster on her nose? Beside, you are going to marry Alice," she pouted, with her old fire returning.

"Marry Alice! I never thought of such a thing. I was only teasing you that day in the library," answered Vane.

"Why, Lottie, can it be that you are jealous?" asked Alice, coming up and smoothing Lottie's nut brown curls. "Vane and I do not want each other. I am going to marry his talented cousin, Dr. Chester Arlington."

"I was very jealous," confessed poor Lottie. "When Vane spoke of marrying you, I tried hard to appear indifferent; but it made me desperate and I did not care what happned to me. Forgive and kiss me Alice."

"Shall I go away, Lottie?" asked Vane.

"Please stay," she returned. "If you can endure a girl with a plaster on her nose, it is not for me to object."

"I shall take such good care of you in the future that you need never more don such disfiguring ornaments," replied her lover, imprinting a kiss square upon that much abused feature.

What he Wanted.

He was belated and was clinging confidingly for support to a lamp-post. His bushy, iron-gray hair framed a noble brow and a face in which thought, trouble and drink had graven deep lines. His hat was gone. As I passed him he touched me on the arm and said in an appealing tone: "Can you help me out?"

"Do you want a bed?" I asked.

"No, sir; much obliged."

"Perhaps you want to go home."

"I have no home," he said, in a tone in which, despite his condition, pain and resignation were equally blended.

"What can I do for you, then?"

"I can't remember it."

"What?"

"It's — by—all—odds—the—finest—in—the—world."

"What's the name of the brand?" I rejoined, "it seems to have made you very happy."

He looked at me deprecatingly from out his large, strong eyes which alone seemed to resist with any success the paralyzing effects of his debauch and replied in a somewhat steadier tone "Brand! I should say so, say so. Brand! That's just it. Ah, Brand, brandy, branded. That's a funny congregation, isn't it? I'm the past participle of that verb. But that isn't here or there. That's not what I was after."

"Well, be kind enough to tell me what you are after" I said sharply.

"Only a minute or two," he said. "Don't be too hard with me. You've got a kind face and I haven't heard a kind word in a year. Sometimes I begin to think I'm a worn out old dog that walks on his hind legs and thinks he's a man. It's been worrying me for a week, and I can't remember it."

"What is that?"

"That verse of Gray's elegy where he talks about the 'urn' and 'bust' and so on."

I repeated the lines to him:

"Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?"

As the words fell from my lips he bent his head gently forward and, when I had concluded, said: "The finest—yes, the finest in the world. Thank you! Curious, isn't it, a drunken man like me wanted to get comfort out of those lines. Ah! the finest—the finest in the world! What a mystery genius is, isn't it? Yes, the finest—the finest!"

"Can I do anything more for you?" I asked.

"Yes, please repeat those lines for me once more."

While I did so I saw two big tears gather in his eyes. When I had finished, he said:

"Thank you; thank you indeed. It's got me into the mire, but I get comfort out of those lines even in the face of my wasted life. I shan't feel degraded there. I fought hard, but it beat me. Brand, brandy, branded. Yes, but it won't scorch there. * * The dull, cold ear of death. Yes, thank you. Good night, sir!"

He steadied himself and turned to walk away.

"Can't I help you in any way?"

"No, sir, thank you!"

The next moment he had disappeared within the door of a neighboring saloon.

"A curious world," I thought to myself. "What do you think?"

A FACT IS A FACT.

I remember once in my childhood's school,
When I was learning Geography's rule,
My master, a man whose methods I held
In teaching a child could not be excelled,
To fix in my mind the formula sound—
"The shape of this our planet is round."
Laid down an apple of wondrous size
(On which I fastened my longing eyes);
An object to make of this fruit so red.
"This is the world! Do you see?" he said.

He remarked, I think, the looks I had cast,
For after awhile, when the lesson was past,
The tempting fruit in my hands he placed,
But never shall I forget the first taste,
For the apple that looked so good and so sweet
Was decayed through to core, not fit to eat!
Then in a tone 'twixt grave, sad and low
(Which did, I think, his great wisdom show),
Said the master, on seeing my grief profound,
"As the apple, thus is the world often found."

Pistols and Diamonds.

Uncle Meriwether never liked Eustace. He never did him justice from the beginning, and when he heard that I was actually engaged to him he spoke in such a way that I declared I wouldn't endure it.

"I am old enough, I hope, to choose for myself," said I.

"I don't know about that, Patty," said my uncle, shrugging his shoulders.

But I remained to hear no more. I flounced back into the house, slamming the door in Uncle Meriwether's honest, spectacled face, and bursting into tears as soon as I reached the sitting room.

"It's a shame," said my sister Elspeth. "Don't cry, Patty; I'm sure the whole matter is transparent enough. Uncle Meriwether wouldn't be so domineering about it if he did not want you to marry Paul."

"I wouldn't marry Paul Meriwether if there wasn't another man in the world," said I, viciously. "And I'll marry Eustace Dalzell anyhow, now. Uncle Meriwether says we don't know anything about him, but I'm sure we know enough."

That was a false assertion on my part. I only knew of my handsome fiance what he himself had chosen to tell me—namely, that he was a New York engineer staying down at Wraysfield a few weeks for his health. And his friend, Mr. Belfield, was a stock broker. Oh, how I wished Mr. Belfield might take a fancy to Elspeth. It would be so nice to be married at the same time—to go together and live in New York!

We lived together in the lonely old brick house on the edge of the moor, so that I was very glad when Olive Oatley came down from Binchester to visit it, and brought her wedding set of diamonds to show.

Elspeth and I looked with awe and admiration at the sparkling gems—necklace, earrings and brooch.

"Are they very valuable?" I asked

"Three thousand dollars, I believe, said Olive, complancently. "They belonged to Herbert's mother, and they are to be re-set before I wear them."

But just then Elspeth gave a start and turned scarlet, and following the direction of her eye I turned scarlet, and beheld Eustace Dalzell standing smiling in the doorway, with his hat in his hand.

Somehow the diamonds made me nervous, and I could not help, in the course of the evening, confiding my vague terrors to Eustace.

But Eustace laughed at me, and made light of my fears.

Eustace Dalzell went home earlier than usual this night. In my perturbation I had almost resolved to ask him to remain all night, a self-constituted guardian of our treasures, but I did not venture to do so, and so at 10 o'clock we three girls, with Dinah in the kitchen, were left to ourselves.

I had intended to lie awake all night, but I must have fallen into a light doze without being aware of it, for the clock was striking 12 when I started up at the loud peal of the door bell below. Olive was at my side in an instant. Elspeth had her arm around me, and even Dinah hobbled in with a flaring lamp in her hand.

"Go to the door, do, some of you," cried I hysterically. "Ask who it is. Ask what they want."

And while Olive, Elspeth, and the old attendant obeyed my behest, I hurriedly threw on my white dressing gown and went to the head of the stairs to listen, for I felt that in an emergency like this some one ought to keep close to the diamonds.

"There is no one here," I heard Elspeth say, after the bolts and the bars of the front door were withdrawn.

"Yes, there is. "I hear some one groaning at the other end of the veranda," persisted Dinah. "Oh, dear, the draught has blown out my candle. This way, Miss Oately, please—I'm afraid there's been an accident or something."

The next minute the heavy oaken door blew shut with a bang. It was self-fastening on the inside. I was all alone in the house.

A rustle under the vines that draped the north side of the house—a low whistle, and I could hear a voice saying in suppressed accents:

"They're safe enough outside, all three of 'em. Now's your time. Quick!"

It all flashed on my mind in a second—the sturdy boughs of the wistaria, which afforded so easy a ladder for an aspiring burglar to reach Olive's window—the open casement—the diamonds lying underneath the pillow. My worst fears had come true, and seizing the six-barrelled little pistol I rushed into the room just in time to see a tall figure with a mask over its face spring into the window and steal with cat-like motion across the room.

As his hand lay on the tiny canvass bag containing the precious jewels I raised the pistol and fired. At the same moment a muttered oath, mingled with a cry, sounded in my ears and the sound of something falling shook the beams of the floor.

I am not one of the fainting kind, but for a minute or two I stood motionless. Then springing down-stairs I admitted the three eager wome who were huddled at the door.

"I've shot him! I've killed him!" was all that I could say. "Run up stairs, Dinah, and see if—if he is dead."

But Dinah would not go alone, so we all hurried up in a crowd—and there, half-sitting, half-lying against the bed post, with the canvas bag fallen to the ground beside him, and a red pool of blood under his right shoulder blade was—Eustace Dalzell.

Of course we sent for help to the nearest neighbor; of course we delivered my gallant lover, who was not fatally injured, over to the police, by whom he was recognized as an old jail-bird, luxuriating in a new name.—New York Sun.

A Happy Family.

Raton, N. M., letter to the Kansas City Times says, there was a happy family living in a cage at a drug store in this city, the members of which family were a mouse, a mountain squirrel, an adder, and a rattlesnake which wore ten rattles. They had been confined in the cage for sometime and were apparently on very amicable terms, when an emeute broke out which finally ended in a war of extermination, and, strange to say, the squirrel well-nigh cleared the entire field.

When or why the row began is not known, the first outbreak noticed being an attack on the mouse by the squirrel in which the former was quickly brained, and the victor proceeded to dispatch the adder by simply cutting his throat. He then retired to refresh himself, and after eating heartily pounced on the rattlesnake. After fiercely biting and scratching the rattler he retired in good order without any serious injury.

Up to this time the snake had been a passive witness to the carnage about him but he now proceeded to join in the melee in earnest. He coiled him self up and, assuming a defensive attitude, waited for the second attack. The squirrel didn't give him long to wait, but the rattler met him half way, and giving a graceful, half circular sweep, fastened his fangs immediately behind the left shoulder of the squirrel. The plucky little animal shook himself loose and made ready to again attack the snake, which lay in the cage with flashing eyes and quivering tail. The poison from the snake rapidly took hold of the little animal, however, and he soon began to show signs of approching death.

Among the thirty or forty witnesses of the spirited and exciting fight was a physician, who took the little fellow out and administered whisky, and strange to say, the next morning the little fellow was apparently as well as ever.

Put It In Writing.

Verbal contracts occasion more trouble, dispute and litigation than any other business transaction. The wise merchant taught by experience will endeavor to have a writing executed by the party to be charged, in every case of importance arising in his buisness. This is especially necessary of guarantees. A man enters your office whom you know to be perfectly responsible. He tells you to sell Brown a thousand dollars worth of goods. Brown is all right, he will answer for that, ect.—Make him sign a memorandum.

A customer gives you a large order for future and instalment deliveries. —Make him sign it in writing.

You engage a salesman for a year, or for a month, or for a trial trip. Have it all put down in writing and signed.

You save taking your chances before a jury, who nine times out of ten prove uncertain and too sympathetic with that party whom they consider is the "under dog."

It is only a little trouble at the time, but it usually saves a heap of trouble in the future.—Trade Mark Record.

"Sweet Solitude's Seclusion."

"Henry, have you sent word to the Social World that we sail for Europe next Monday?"

"Yes."

"And that there is a rumor to the effect that Bella is engaged to a foreign count at whose castle we will spend a portion of the season?"

"Yes my dear; I've taken care of that."

"Then I guess I'll write to Cousin Amanda to expect us in a day or so at the farm; and say. Henry, don't forget to get me two three or European guide-books. I don't intend to let that hateful Mrs Sniff get ahead of me this year."—Judge.

Vaccination in the Harem.

One hundred and fifty of the ladies of the Sultan's seraglio at Constantinople have just been vaccinated. The Italian surgeon who performed the operations was stationed on one side of an immense screen which concealed the women. A hole was made in the screen large enough for an arm to pass through, and the operator was confronted in turn by arms of every size and complexion. To guard against any temptation to curiosity, two eunuchs who stood by the surgeon, covered his head with a shawl after each operation, and did not remove it till the lady had withdrawn her arm and another one taken her place.

Lincoln With a Book.

Twenty years ago no photograph was more often seen than that of President Lincoln sitting with a big book on his knee, and his little son Tad leaning against him and looking at it with him. The book was then thought to be a Bible, but it wasn't. It was Potographer Brady's picture album, which the president was examining with his son while some ladies stood by. The artist begged the president to remain quiet, and the picture was taken.

Nothing is too good for the average Deadwood juvenile. Not long ago a professional nurse was summoned from Binghampton, N. Y., to assist at the arrival of a Black Hills girl. A train of ten wheat wagons, bearing nearly one thousand bushels, drawn by a friction engine, arrived in Aberdeen, from the Hall farm, four miles south of that place. The outfit was photographed in the presence of a large number of spectators. The grain averaged fifteen bushels per acre and after active bidding brought $1.20.

Considerable trouble is being experienced through the territory in getting loans completed on account of discrepancies in the record in regard to names. In some cases the final receipt and patent do not agree, and in many cases names are sometimes spelled with an initial letter and sometimes without. Sometimes the names to a mortgage will be written in full and the release will give only the initials, and in other cases names are written so badly that it is impossible to tell what they are intended for.

The government of the Province of Quebec is taking steps to induce many of the 500,000 French Canadians who, from year to year, have left that province to settle in the United States, to return to the land of their birth. With this object in view, it has dispatched two commissioners, one to work among their compatriots in the New England states and the other through New York state.

Two physicians were suddenly summoned in the country about five miles from Humboldt, Iowa, to attend to a very distressing case. A German named Fred Leaman had gone into town with his wife to attend a political rally, leaving a six months' old baby in charge of young children. The children left the baby on the kitchen floor alone, and while they were out in the yard playing a young shoat came in and attacked the child. Before its cries attracted the elder children the hog had eaten off the fingers of the baby's right hand, a toe off each foot, one ear and a part of another, and had otherwise horribly mutilated the helpless babe. It was several hours before the parents returned and several more before medical aid could be secured, but the child will probably live.

The National Zeitung, of Berlin, Germany, says: The frivolity with which international difficulties are provoked by political factions in America is especially evident in the Sackville affair. After the Republicans set a trap to catch a strikingly harmless English minister and diseried it, Mr. Cleveland as the candiate of the foreigners, Mr. Cleveland himself tries to cross this maneuver by exaggerated severity against Lord Sackville. This conduct appears comical from the fact that Mr. Cleveland does not leave England in doubt as to his aim in so acting. This kind of thing is scarcely calculated to raise the reputation of the American republic.

A Republican President, a Republican Congress, a Republican Senate, a Republican Governor, a Republican Legislature and a Republican County Ticket, with perhaps one or two exceptions.

Returns come in very slowly but enough is known to ensure the grandest and most emphatic victory for the Republicans that they have seen for years. We have elected our Presidential ticket a good majority in Congress, our Governor, our State ticket entire, our Legislature, and our entire county ticket with exception of county commissioners in the third and fifth districts. One feature, of great surprise to our democratic brethren and a pleasant surprise to many republicans, was the noble way in which the French population rallied to the support of the republican ticket—a regular "landslide" in some towns. Gentilly, which has always been solidly democratic gives the republican ticket one-half her voters and Terrebonne, that has always been called the "banner town of democracy" gives 51 republican votes. The dastardly attempt of Gilman and Sheffer to wreak their vengeance on the republican candidate for governor receives an emphatic and deserved rebuke from Polk County. On the face of the returns so far received Paterson, for sheriff, has the majority but the towns to hear from yet are sure to bring Paulsrud out ahead.

Scientific Farming.

The Prairie Farmer.

If you tell some men that the reason they do not make at farming is because they do not farm scientifically, they will look at you in surprise, and finally inform you that they are not college graduates with big bank accounts, so that they can grow crops without regard to cost. There is where they are wrong. Scientific farming is simply farming according to the best light that is thrown on the subject by what is now known about it.

Webster's first and best definition of science is "knowledge," and "scientific" he defines as, "agreeing with, or depending on, the rules or principles of science." So when you find a farmer who grows good crops and makes money on them, at the same time increasing the fertility of his soil, you have found a scientific farmer, whether he graduated at college, the district school, or the plow.

All this and more was suggested by reading Bulletin, No. 34, of the Missouri Agricultural College, written by Prof. J. W. Sanborn. I will quote some of the striking parts of this bulletin to show what science (knowledge) has done on a farm, formerly managed without regard to science. This farm belongs to the Missouri Agricultural College, and, if previous to the year 1882 the college has not done much to increase the knowledge of farming, we need go no farther than the college farm to find the reason.

Prof. Sanborn says: "In the fall of 1882 the farm consisted of 610 acres on the farm proper, and 30 acres in the horticultural department. The former consisted of 4 acres of young orchard of 4 years standing, and 10 acres, 2 years from setting; 164 acres of plow land; some 50 acres of heavy shaded pasture, and the balance, 398 acres, bluffs and woods, the woods being a dense growth of white oak, not large enough to cut at a profit, although mixed in with good wood. The open pasture was largely covered with a dense growth of buck bushes, which extended into the woods wherever the growth was thin. Except 40 acres of bottom-land field, the field land was quite thickly studded with trees and bristling with stumps over much of it, so that the use and preservation of machinery was an impossibility without great care. The entire fence lines of these fields were flanked with bushes on either side often in wide bands, while all draws or runs running through the fields were filled with them or debris. One now beautiful field of 70 acres was in four sections or fields, fenced with rail-fences, and plowed as 8 fields on account of draws and bushes. The fences on the farm were mostly miserable. Its meagre pastures were so shaded by trees and bushes as to afford uncertain growth for stock."

There you have the sad picture of a neglected farm, naturally rich, but from the want of science, reduced to this unpromising condition. The yield of crops for '82 and '83 was of wheat less than 10 bushels per acre; corn from 25 to 40 bushels; the bottom-land having been "corned" for years, gave the lowest yield; hay 1 to 1¼ tons per acre.

Here are the "buildings:" "The thing called a barn, and the only one, to shelter the horses or any other stock, was approached by throwing the feed out of a loft door to the ground, from which the hay was brought in behind each horse to its stall. The well was used after climbing a fence which surrounded it, while the log corn bin was usable by climbing in at the window."

Truly the professor's heart must have glowed when he found all these great "conveniences" and contrasted them with those he had left in New Hampshire.

To encourage him he was told that "the farm must be made self-sustaining." "This," continues the report, "then became the problem—to take the farm in chaos, with little personal capital, with no power to borrow it, and to run it as a school farm and also as an experiment farm from its own resources, while at the same time engaged in teaching for the college, and writing, lecturing and working for a variety of other agricultural interests."

So, you see, Prof. Sanborn not only had a hard task to perform, but could not give nearly all his time to it. That is the trouble with a great many of us farmers; we cannot spend time enough on the farm, having to lecture so much at the store and blacksmith shop.

What he accomplished is best told in his own words: "Its fertility has nearly reached the standard set for it, of an average crop of sixty bushels of oats, three tons timothy, four tons clover, eighty bushels corn, and forty bushels of wheat yearly. The farm will winter and pasture twice to thrice and one-half as much stock in better condition than it would six years ago, under the system then pursued, or the ordinary system of the state."

During that period "the improvements carried out from the profits of the farm amounts to $3,524, to which add $1,441 increase of invoice, giving $4,885. To this it would be proper to add shrinkage in values of $1,200 to $1,500, if real advance is to be ascertained. This is for five years, as the sixth year is not yet concluded. But the important advance is in the doubled fertility of the farm, from which revenues can easily be derived. It has rich, cleared fields and good pastures, good tools and stock, and a system of farming that costs less to handle than at first."

It seems that the bottom is not quite knocked out of farming, and Prof. Sanborn gives this word of encouragement: "In view of all the above facts, I feel authorized in saying to our struggling farmers, who are passing through one of the hardest times our agriculture has known, and who have my profound sympathy, in all their efforts to better their condition, that a higher type of farming, which seeks not only to give soil fertility, but to increase it, and which also saves all present wastes, so characteristic of the west, is a most decidedly safe and encouraging one to pursue."

These certainly are hard times for farmers, and that very fact calls for more scientific farming. When times are good, and there are good crops and high prices, we are apt to overlook the little things, but now, being brought down to hard-pan, former little items assume a size we did not believe them capable of.

We must bear in mind Prof. Sanborn's advice, not only to keep up the fertility of the farm, but to increase it. To do this, we must change some of our old-time notions; the cream of the rich soils has been taken off; we must try and replace it, and not keep on skimming, hoping that more will rise.

Dairying, cattle and pig-growing, farm garden crops, poultry, bees, fruit, absence from every place but the farm at least five days in the week—any of these will help to solve the problem, if science is applied in the right way, especially the last named.

Rockland Farm, Md.

A. L. CROSBY.

Holsteins for the Dairy,

Farm, Stock and Home.

I was about to write a note from the text of Mr. Kenning's remarks in the "Gossip" of your last number, to the effect that he was eliminating Holstein blood from his herd, for the reason that it failed to improve his milk or butter product, that they were "infinitely worse than natives for beef," and that he had bought a carload of pure bred Jersey, when my attention was called to a couple of items in other papers, which I will here refer to. The first is a statement by Henry Stewart, in the Rural New Yorker. Speaking of individual differences between cows of the same breed, he says: "A typical instance is afforded by the well known difference in Jersey cows, of which there are probably more than 50,000 in existence in America, and of these less than 1,200 yield over 14 pounds of butter weekly. * * * The majority of Jersey cows will not yield more than 5 pounds weekly as an average of the milking season; and thus, perhaps, there is a greater variation in regard to the individual in this breed than in any other race of cows. (Mr. Stewart's figures for the 14-pound cows are 200, but I am satisfied it is a slip and that 1,200 is intended. That is the number that Jersey breeders claim, I believe.) It should be remembered that the registered Jersey cows are about 50,000, and that there is a vast number—possibly 50,000 more—of so-called pure bred Jersey cows (Mr. Kenning's included possibly) not entitled to registry; but the 14-pound cows are substantially all counted.

The second item is a "Cow Census" in a late number of Hoard's Dairyman. A correspondent of that paper has collected very careful statistics of the of the principal daries in the town of Ellisburg, N. Y., one of the greatest, if not the greatest, dairy town in that state or any other. The statistics may be summarized by the "annual earnings per cow," only the extremes are being published. I present here the figures for twelve dairies, all I think that have been published so far:

No. Dairy	No. Cows.	BREEDS.	Average Earning per Year.
1	11	Short-horn grades	$42.05.
2	11	Short-horn grades	27 01.
3	19	Short-horn grades	24.03.
4	22	Short-horn & Gurnsey grades	26.83.
5	8	Short-horn grades	23.57.
6	18	Short-horn & Ayershire grade	26.60.
7	35	Short-horn grades	39.28.
8	14	Natives	22.87.
9	22	Natives	23.73.
10	13	Natives	37.69.
11	44	High grade Holderness	50.49.
12	6	Holstein grades	57.50.

I believe in Holsteins and own some, but I want no one to make false inferences from the figures or statements above—nor even from Mr. Kenning's experience or statement. There are good cows and poor in every breed, even in the breed of scrubs. But there is more difference in keepers, as I believe, than in cows. The dairy quality highly developed is a highly artificial thing, hard to cultivate, hard to maintain, and easy to get away. The dairyman must select with great care, and feed and handle with skill, or he won't have any of the 14-pound or 50-dollar kind of cows, no matter what the breed.

I wish now simply to remind your readers of the showing made by Mr. S. Lester's Holstein-Friesian grades at the last Minnesota State Fair, affirm my faith in the good Holstein-Friesian cow, whether pure or grade, for dairy purposes, and close.

BOOKER.

Milk Signs.

What an Expert Considers Valuable as Signs of a "Good Milker."

S. Hoxie, in Rural Canadian.

The ability of cows to produce large quantities of milk is acquired in the domesticated state, and is undoubtedly the result of demand, training, and food. It is the general impression that such ability together with the ability to produce rich milk, may be discovered through outward signs.

Under the head of Milk Signs may be included all the outward appearances of cattle, and of their products, that indicate quantity, quality or healthfulness of milk.

One of the most commonly accepted signs for both quantity and quality is what is called the "milk form." It may be described as a gradual widening of the animal from the front of the shoulder to the hips, and setting on of the hind quarters. This widening is sometimes only lateral, and sometimes both lateral and perpendicular. To be perfect, the shoulders should be thin, the forward legs comparatively close together, the quarters without much flesh, and the appearance throughout the whole frame angular.

Another of the commonly accepted signs is, "a large udder, drawn up closely to the body, and well rounded at the sides." I think such formed udders are more apt to contain adipose tissues than lower hanging udders. A gentleman conversant with Jersey cattle remarked that he had never seen a remarkable butter cow that had not as he termed it, a "broken down udder." The size of the udder, even if it could be exactly ascertained, I am persuaded, could not be implicitly relied upon as a measure of the milk glands that must exist in different animals that cannot be discovered by an outward appearance.

Another of the commonly received signs is "very large and very crooked lacteal veins. The lacteal veins carry the blood away from the udder toward the heart. There is no doubt that the degrees in the size of these veins, and perhaps their degree of crookedness, indicate degrees of milking ability. I have found in many instances, cows having very large and very tortuous veins that were excelled in milking ability by cows with veins of less size and less crookedness.

Another commonly accepted sign is the orifices in the abdomen and chest, to which I have just referred. In some animals these orifices are only two in number—one on right, and the other on the left side of the abdomen. These are called main orifices and are usually larger than the others. In some cases these orifices are so large that the end of the forefinger may be fairly introduced into them. If I were obliged to choose any one of the so called milk signs upon which exclusively to rely, it would be these orifices. Yet the impression should not be obtained that these are by any means exact measures, or infallible.

Hon. Zadock Pratt, of Green Co. N Y., in a statement made to the New York Agricultual Society, reports a carefully conducted experiment on fifty cows owned by him during five consecutive years, from 1857 and including 1861, which shows to what a remarks extent food and care effect the milk: "The first year it required 39,2 pound-pounds of milk for one pound of butter; the second, 23.3 pounds; the fifth, 21 pounds. The amount of butter per cow per year increased in the same proportion. The herd was made up of so called 'native cows,' and consisted of substantially the same animals, there being only the ordinary changes in such a herd........". He was constantly improving his yield of butter by special feeding, and this increase in butter was not from increased yield of milk, but from an improved quality.

The strongest evidence of cows producing healthy milk is in their dropping strong healthy calves at birth, and their rapid development and continued health while being fed on the milk of their dams. If I were to advise those who have families of young children in regard to the milk they should purchase and use, I would say get your milk from herds where the calves are healthy and strong. Do not especially worry about its chemical constituents, but look to its pathological conditions. The conditions are of a thousand times more consequence to you and your families, than whether milk has certain proportions of sugar, caseine, and fat. And were I to advise the authorities of our cities in regard to what milk should be sold in their markets, I would say, have inspectors appointed in every district from whence you draw your supply, and have them inspect the cows and their calves, the food they eat and the water they drink, and you will save thousand and thousands of lives and untold anguish of fathers and mothers over the graves of their little ones slain by unhealthy milk that you admit to your market, because it has in it the standard amount of solids.

Scale of Points for Milking Cows.

The following is from the London Farmer of Aug. 3d. It will be of interest to many of our readers who desire to know how good milkers are judged;

"I cannot forbear to notice the exceedingly ingenious system which was adopted in the recent milking trials in the Edinburgh show by Mr. James McQueen, the judge, in order to ascertain which of the animals were entitled to the prizes. To some extent the scale of points was based upon the system adopted by the British Farmer's Association, but there is an additional value attaching to it by the ingenious method of totalling the points. It will be remembered that the prize for the best milking cow is not given to the animal giving the largest quantity of milk, nor to the one giving milk of the best quality; but that, in London, the two milkings are weighed and the quantity milk set down, a certain number of points being allowed. The total solids are then ascertained, and two points for every one per cent, allowed. The time since calving in days is then given, for which one-tenth per cent is allowed. These points are then totaled, and if the fat has failed to reach a certain standard, a deduction is made which tells against the cow. Thus, for example, taking one of the prize cows at the London Dairy Show, giving 40 lbs. 7 oz. of milk, or about 16 quarts, she is allowed one per cent., thus giving her 40.44 points. Her solids weigh 12.41. and for these she got 24.62 points. She had calved 70 days, and was allowed 7 points, or in all 72.06. Now if we take a case showing the system adopted in Edinburg, the first prize cow received 80.56 points as follows.

	Pounds.	Points.
Weight of milk in 24 hours	32.06	32.00
Total solids	13.76	13.76
Butterfat	5.26
Three per cent of the fat is standard.
Add or deduct 10 per cent for every one per cent above or below—consequently add		22.50
Time since calving 123 days.
Add one point for every ten days		12.30
Total		80.56

I have carefully looked through the scales of points as applied to every individual cow of which particulars are published, and it appears to me that the system adopted is as near perfect as possible. The big milker does not gain in consequence of having recently calved, unless she is an equally good butter-maker, and an example may be given of a cow which yielded 47.25 lbs of milk. She had calved only 28 days, and her milk was very poor; consequently her great excess of milk was of no avail against the rich quality of the first cow. One of the most important features in this, as in the English trials—and it is one that Americans ought to notice—is that the cow in every individual case fell so far below the standard of American big milkers as to give one the impression ether that English cattle, or at all events those which are exhibited, are of little value at all for the dairy, or else that the American yields are vastly overestimated. Mr. Simpson, who is one of the best authorities upon the Jersey in Great Britain, and who has probably had more good cows pass through his hands than any one in the country, declared the other day, at a meeting of the Jersey Society, that he did not believe a word with regard to the American trials; and in spite of the fact that American stock breeders are exceedingly clever, and that they pay a vast sight more attention to results than we do in England, I am afraid I shall not credit the big things which American Jerseys have done until I am able to see one of these trials conducted with my own eyes."

The Feeding Value of Potatoes And Bran Compared.

ED HOARD'S DAIRYMAN:—R. Sutton Richland Center, Wis., writes to the Station to know whether potatoes at 25 cts. per bushel are cheaper for feeding milch cows than bran.

Approaching the subject for the chimical side we can get a pretty satisfactory and definite answer from that point of view. At 25 cts, per bushel, potatoes are worth about 40 cts' per 100 lbs. Calling bran $12.00 per ton we have a cost of 60 cts. per 100 lbs. so that the question is, "which is the cheaper feed, potatoes at 40 cts. per 100 or bran at 60 cts.?" If Mr. Sutton will turn to page 104 of the Fourth Annual Report of this Station he will find a table showing the digestible constituents of our common food articles. I would say, by the way, that this table will be inserted for convenient reference in the next report, soon to be issued, and those who are interested can secure a copy which will be sent free to all residents of the state.

By the table we find: 100 lbs potatoes worth 40 cts. contain 1 lb. protein, 16,6 lbs. carbo-hydrates. 100 lbs. wheat bran worth 60 cts. contain 12,6 lbs protein and 47 lbs. carbo-hydrates and fat.

It is quite evident that the bran is far cheaper than the potatoes for feeding purposes at the prices named and if a farmer can get 25 cts. per bushel for the potatoes he can afford to haul them some distance to exchange for bran at such prices. The potatoes would require cooking if fed to cows. I believe however that if one should feed potatoes to stock he will get rather better results than would be indicated by a chemical expression as I have here given. Animals require variety in their food in order to make the best gain and the farmer who feeds nothing but hay and bran or cornstalks and bran all winter long will find that for a time his cows will show remarkable results from almost any new kind of palatable food they may receive. It will be seen however that in a discussion of this kind this side of the question can hardly receive the attention it merits, for we are asked to compare two kinds of feed and state as closely as possible the worth of each.

The actual feeding value of an apple or pickle may be very small but when one's system craves either it is probable that at that time it is worth much beyond what the chemist would assert. For this reason potatoes may have a higher value than I have given to them but if one is to feed a large quantity he may consider the figures given as about correct.

W. A. HENRY.

Hogs pay Best.

The Windom Citizen Thinks They are Better Then Cattle in Minnesota.

Hogs are a good paying crop this year at 5¼ cents, but beef cattle are almost worthless, only 1¼ cents live weight. The only way for a successful farmer is to diversify—raise every-thing that's fit to eat or wear—don't say drink—and he will be sure to hit something that will pay. Don't drop everything else and go into that which pays the best this year, for you don't know what will do the best next year; it may be something entirly different; cattle and sheep may pay best another year; so don't sacrifice to get rid of them now. The secret of a rich old farmer in the East was that he bought when every body was selling, and sold when they were all buying. He did not go with the crowd, and thus made a big success. Many of our Western farmers would do well to follow his example and make it pay.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., NOVEMBER 8.

Council Proceedings.

Pursuant to adjournment the city council of the city of Crookston met Oct. 23d, 1888.

President Watts in the chair. Present Alds. Jennings, Jerome, Childs, Lally, Buhn and Marlette.

Minutes of last meeting read and approved.

Petition presented and read signed by numerous citizens requesting to have the electric light now located at intersection of Broadway and Third Streets to be placed at the intersection of Broadway and Second Streets, which was on motion referred to the aldermen of the Second and Third wards, to report at next regular meeting.

Communication of John Swanson asking the reduction of license for shooting galleries was read, and on motion laid on the table.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of conferring with the St. P., M. & M. railway company with reference to the maintenance of safety gates on the crossing of Robert street over said railroad tracks, reported progress, and asking that more time be allowed which was granted.

Committee to whom was referred the proposition of Mr. Hurlbut, for the sale of his map to the city, asked for further time to report which was granted.

The committee on finance to whom was referred the report of justice Spendley reported, and on motion report was accepted, and it was ordered that a copy of said report be sent by the city clerk to each of the city justices.

The report of the comptroller estimoting the amount required to be levied upon the taxable property within the city for the ensuing year for the payment of interest on bonded indebtedness falling due within the curent year, which was placed in the hands of the finance committee at the Oct. 9th 1888 meeting, was returned by said committee with the following report:

The committee on finance to whom was referred the comptroller's estimates of the amount required to be levied upon the taxable property of the city for the ensuing year for the payment of interest on the bonded indebtedness to fall due within the current year, have had the same under advisement, and would respectfully report that they concur in the above named estimates and recommend that a tax be levied upon the property legally liable for this purpose sufficient to insure the raising of the amount of $5,710 therein specified. Also in regard to that part of his report estimating the sums necessary to be raised from the property abutting on certain streets to reimburse the sinking fund for certain sums advanced from it to cancel outstanding orders against said streets, we find his estimates correct according to the best information at our command, and if in your wisdom it is deemed wise to so reimburse said fund, we would recommend the sums therein specified be assessed against the property along those streets.

We have also had under consideration his estimates of the amounts which will be required to meet the current expenses for the next ensuing year, and his report of the sums collected during the first year from sources other than direct taxation, and with the exception of the one item of $1,500 for "streets," we concur in the same, and would recommend that you levy a tax upon all the taxable property of the city sufficient for the raising of the sum of $2,686 for general fund.

In regard to the assessment for streets the charter provides that all expenses connected with opening, grading and keeping in repair streets, lanes, alleys; highways and thoroughfares, "other than the expenses incurred on bridges crossing Red Lake River, or like structures crossing railway tracks," shall be paid from taxation upon the several wards wherein such work shall be done. See sec. 9, chap. 8.

It also provides that the city council, shall, at the time of making the levy for current expenses, and upon the recommendation of the aldermen of the several words of the city, levy upon the taxable property of such ward, such tax, not exceeding 4 mills upon the dollar of the assesed valuation of such ward as may be necessary to defray the expenses of such ward for the next fiscal year. See sec. 8, chap. 5.

And we would therefore recommend that in lieu of raising the sum of $1,500 in the general fund as recommended by the comptroller, the alderman of each ward nominate the sum to be levied in their words for street service, and that you levy the tax so recommended as by law provided.

On motion of ald. Jerome and seconded by ald. Marlette the report was accepted by unanimous vote.

JOHN PATERSON, Clerk.

Care of Cows.

Pa. Farmer. Our cows receive too little attention during the summer. They are often turned out to grass in spring and no more attention given them than to give them an occasional ration of salt. The rain may pour, they stand and take it; the chilly nights may come after a rain when the skin is covered with wet hair, and they shiver and bear it, but this is wrong.

The stable should be in a clean condition at all times for the reception of the cows. It should be their home, where they can find shelter in storm and cold.

Cows should be milked there, salted there and their toilet made there. A warm, soaking rain is enjoyed. It washes the skin and refreshes the body, but the hair should be straightened with the card or curry-comb when it is dry. The action of the skin and purity of the blood has much to do with the character of the milk.

When the pores of the skin become clogged the milk takes a cowey odor and taste. This is because the impurities of the body are misdirected into the milk. The farmer who would curry his horses every day will seldom touch his cows with a brush. This is partiality of the worst kind, besides it is poor economy. If you want a cow to do her best give her a chance by giving her just as good quarters and just as much care as your favorite horse. When a cold rain comes you put him into his stall. If a chilly night comes he gets his feed in the barn, but poor bos must chew her cud in discomfort, and you complain that she shrinks in milk. Apply the remedy and see the difference.

"The Morning Greeting," is the title of the premium engraving which Peterson's magazine offers as a club premium for 1889. It is very beautiful and in a style entirely different from any of preceding years. The background shows a picturesque cottage and landscape, and in front stands a lovely girl surrounded by the dumb pets of the farm. It is from a painting by a celebrated artist and is a gem. Another premium will be "Buds and Blossoms," a volume of original and selected poems, handsomely bound and profusely illustrated with beautiful wood and steel engravings. It is decidedly the most perfect gift-book ever offered by any magazine. Another premium is a year's subscription to the magazine. The leading newspapers pronounce Peterson equal in a literary point of view to the highest-priced periodicals, and as a fashion guide far ahead of any of the lady's books. It has some of America's most popular authors among its contributors. It has numerous excellent wood illustrations, and its fancy and household departments are unrivaled. Terms $2 per year, with great reductions to clubs. Get up a club and thus secure one or more of ese handsome premiums. Specimens, ith full club rates, etc., sent gratis to those wishing to get up clubs. Address, Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Merriam's Majority.

The Pioneer Press of Thursday, says: The ascertained or reported results of the vote on governor in nearly every case considerably exceed the estimates by counties of Merriam's majorities published by the Pioneer Press on Tuesday, while the majorities for Wilson are in nearly every case less than was estimated. The total result is that Merriam's majority in the state will exceed 20,000, which is 7,000 above our estimate. The echoes of Gilman's and Scheffer's eloquence may be distinctly heard reverberating through these returns. Considering the venomous and dirty warfare of personal calumny which was waged against Merriam by some of his defeated rivals and by the democratic managers and their tools, the result is a magnificent popular vindication of the republican candidate and a terrible rebuke to his cowardly assailants. There was hardly an iniquity in the calendar of human crime of which he was not accused by his adversaries, and all sorts of absurd personal slanders were circulated about him by the paid agents of the democratic managers. It is greatly to the credit of Mr. Merriam that he refused to stoop to the denial of any of the base and malignant assaults upon his personal character, and that he had the proud courage to leave his vindication to the people. The people have rendered the verdict that might have been expected, and in the rousing majority of over 20,000 they have given the answer to his assailants that might have been expected of their intelligence and their sense of justice.

IS VIRGINIA REPUBLICAN?

A Claim that There Is Good Ground for This Statement.

A Washington special to the Minneapolis Evening Journal, dated Nov. 9 says: The latest information from a reliable source in Virginia shows that the claim of the democrats to have carried that state by 2,800 is not warranted. The republicans are certain they have carried Virginia by 2,000 majority. Five republican congressmen will be declared elected as they have good grounds for a contest, and with a republican house those later are certain to have a fair count. Thirty-nine white counties out of forty were carried by an increased republican vote of 6,500, and if the others had held their own the state would have gone republican by 4,000. The republicans will have the following districts: First, Second, Third, Fifth and Ninth.

TO REDUCE TAXATION.

Gen. Harrison May Call Congress Together for that Purpose.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9.—A Washington special to the Herald says that it appears probable that Gen. Harrison will, immediately after his induction into office, call the members of the 51st congress together. His motive for this will be to arrange some plan for the reduction of taxation. There is no reasonable ground for the belief that any concurrent action upon the matter will be had at the session beginning in December next. To wait till the regular assembling of the 51st congress, which will be republican in both branches, would be to postpone the subject until the session was well underway. In other words, a year and a half from the present time would necessarily elapse before a tariff bill acceptable to the administration could be passed. Gen. Harrison's friends say he will be unwilling to wait 18 months before moving in a matter so important, and that the outlook therefore for an extra session is one which may be classed among the strong probabilities of the near future.

THE NATIONAL HOUSE.

The Republican Majority Will Be Between 15 and 20.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9.—"I believe we will have from 15 to 20 majority in the next house," said Secretary McPherson, of the republican congressional campaign committee, to-day. Taking up a table printed in a New York republican paper, he said: "I am going to give the democrats all that they claim within reason where the actual returns have not removed all doubt." From this table he reduced the republican claims for congressmen by one in each Florida, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and West Virginia, and by two in Virginia. In that shape he declared he allowed all democratic claims in doubtful cases, and the result was a republican majority of 15. He could not see how it could possibly be reduced below that figure, and allowing for the republican chances in doubtful districts, as in Virginia, Maryland, West Virginia, North Carolina and elsewhere, he confidently expected that the republican majority would be found to be nearer twenty than fifteen.

Col. C. H. Graves for Speaker.

Duluth Tribune: The triumphant election of Col. Graves to the legislature by a majority of over 5,000 places him more prominently than ever before the people of Minnesota as the most suitable and best qualified member of the house for the speakership this winter. Representing the largest and most populous legislative district in the state, and backed as he is by such an overwhelming majority he certainly ought to be chosen to the position to which he aspires by acclamation. And it is more than likely that this will be done.

How it was Received at the Cross Roads.

CONFDRIT XROADS, Kentucky, Nov. the eight.—The infernel regins seems to hev broke loos. Ef ther is enything left of the onct fare fabrick of dimmicratic supremmissy I fale to perseev it with the naked eye. Grover is gon; the dimmicratic congress is gon; the days of free drinks and whippin niggers is gon, and I don't want to live no longer. Bascom swears he wont keep open house no more, nor trust for nips if he does. What has bekum of Fisk and his crowd what said they could pull us threw and we'd together smash the republican party? They seem to be gon too. And even the solid south appears to be busted, and West Virginny hez gon over to the Fillistines. Hentsfourth life is a lode to me.

DEEKIN POGRAM.

The State Legislature.

St. Paul Dispatch: The political complexion of the next legislature will be as follows on joint ballot so far as the returns indicate: Republican, 119; democrats, 25; independent and farmer's alliance, 4. The house stands; republicans, 84; democrats, 9; alliance, 2; independent, 2; tied, 1. The senate: Republicans, 35; democrats, 12.

In the Congressional Districts.

Dispatch: The majorities in the five congressional districts of the republican candidates for congress are as follows, with a number of counties to hear from: First district, Dunnell over Wilson, 2,456; Second districl, Lind over Wilkinson, 5,340; Third district, Hall over MacDonald, 4,064; Fourth district, Snider over Rice, 11,000; Fifth district, Comstock over Canning, 8,000.

An Opportunity and a Duty.

Minneapolis Journal.

The republicans have a magnificent opportunity. The question whether the great principle of protection of American industries should be preserved as a part of our national policy has been decided in favor of its continuance. The republicans, as the defenders of that principle, have been given full power, by having control of every branch of the government, to so apply the principle as to produce the best results.

That is their opportunity; that is their duty.

When the Chicago platform was adopted many a friend of the system of protection was heard to complain that that system had received its hardest blow from its too ardent and very indiscreet friends. The first impression made by that platform upon the country was decidedly unfavorable. It was taken as a stubborn refusal to recognize the necessity of any reform in the tariff. That was not the popular feeling and hundreds of thousands of republicans felt that their party had been forced into a position on this question which they could not take—that it had parted company with its judgment.

That was the feeling when the campaign opened, and the outlook was by no means bright in those days. But soon there began to appear evidences from every quarter that while the definition of the party's position in the national platform might have been unfortunate, the great mass of the republicans would not consent to be forced into an apparently false position on the vital issue of the day. The frank and manly utterances of the Presidential candidate were among the first assurances that the party had not gone astray. Then followed the interpretation of the national platform by the liberal press of the country in the light of the historic attitude of the party and its leaders on this issue and the preparation of a tariff bill by the republican senate. All these and many other assurances of fidelity to the cause of the people were made the more satisfactory by the extreme free trade utterances of the democratic leaders from the South and by their forcing upon their party a measure which had neither the merit of being adapted to the purpose for which it was professedly intended—revenue reduction—nor the quality of being framed in the public interest with respect to industries of the country or the relief of the people from taxation.

As the lines for the final contest on this issue were formed they rapidly took positions favorable to the republicans. It became distinctly and unavoidably a question of protection or free trade. The republicans have won on that issue, and they have deserved to. Now what are they going to do about it? Will they realize the fact that they could not have won if they had not persuaded the people that their's is the true party of tariff reform? And will they, as soon as they have opportunity, proceed to "adjust the inequalities of the tariff" in the interest of the people?

They cannot afford to do otherwise. The protective principle has been preserved, thanks to the intelligence of the people. But it was preserved to be made of the highest possible benefit to the country. It has been preserved for a good purpose. The republican have an opportunity to make it serve that purpose in the highest degree. That is certainly a magnificent opportunity. It is unquestionably an imperative duty.

An Old Settler Gone.

Red Lake Falls News: Isaiah Gervais, one of the two oldest settlers in this vicinity, died at 11 o'clock Friday, the 2d day of November, at his home near this village, from internal injuries received some time ago, from being thrown out of a buggy on his way home from town. He was interred in the Catholic cemetery west of town, on Monday, at 10 o'clock. Mr. Gervais was born in Winnipeg, Manitoba; moved to St. Paul, this state, 50 years ago, with Pierre Bottineau, and just 12 years ago the day of his death, he arrived in Red Lake Falls from St. Paul, with Pierre Botineau and family. These two gentlemen, Messrs. Bottineau and the deceased, were the influence that brought so many Canadian French to this county, and especially to this vicinity. The former was well acquainted with the Canadian people; and after he moved to this country, he made a number of trips to the province and escorted large colonies over to this country. The gentlemen mentioned, with their families, were the first two families settled in this vicinity; and by writing a number of letters to Manitoba, they were the means of inducing this large French colony to immigrate and settle here. Mr. Gervais was at the time of his death half owner of a gold mine in Idaho; His son, L. H. Gervais, owns the other half; said mine is considered valuable. He leaves a wife and a number of grown up children to mourn his departure, and Red Lake Falls loses one of her best citizens.

Fertile Journal: Again we are reminded of the dangers of an over indulgence of the habit of drinking. Dr. Knickerbocker was called into the country Sunday to attend a man who had fallen from his wagon in an intoxicated condition while driving home from Crookston. A wheel passed over his head, inflicting a severe scalp wound. The wound was fortunately not of a dangerous nature.

Gill & Forrester in the Moorhead News: The end will be reached pretty soon. All the mills in the country have been grinding incessantly for the past six weeks, with the result that the eastern markets are gluttend. At the same time there is little exported for the reason that the price of flour in American is a dollar per barral higher than in England. Wheat will have to go down in the west or the mills will be obliged to close down. It is too high now to sell the flour. The estimated crop of the United States is put at a little less than 400,000,000 bushels, against 457,000,000 last year. There is no old stock to mention, and the estimated ameunt required for home consumption and seed varies somewhat. The estimates of amount that can be spared for export is from 35,000,000 to 65,000,000 bushels. It is belived the higher prices of flour will affect the consumption per capita, but to what extent can only be conjectured, hence the discrepancies in the estimates.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., NOVEMBER 8.

'Round Home.

No. 1 Hard wheat $1.04.

Wax tapers for the illumination, at Herb's.

Everybody enjoys this nice republican weather.

A. C. Wilkinson says: "I am out of politics." Wilk is a democrat.

I can promise my friends and customers a surprise when they inspect my establishment and see the limitless array of new and handsome goods I can show them. C. H. SAAKE,

What's the matter with a good stage line north to St. Vincent?

We have only one note and mortgage we make a loan the day applied for, charge no bonus, and make interest payable at our office in Crookston.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

That "affidavit that will hurt Comstock" was sprung too late, Chawles.

We are not advertising to leave town but we are advertising to sell jewelry as low as any concern in the city. Call and see Berthiaume Jewelry Co.

Mrs. T. E. Adams has gone to her old home in Tennessee for the winter.

I. U. Jennings has bought the Carey elevator and is prepared to buy all grades of wheat and barley and give the farmers an honest deal. If they will bring him samples of their grain he will give them pointers that will be of advantage to them. [24-tf

1,000 Chinese lanterns for the big blow-out on Saturday evening at Herb's.

We must and will sell that large stock of Gents' and Youths' clothing just received at the Boston One Price Clothing Store. Mossefin & Lindell, Prop's.

A limited supply of flags and fireworks on hand at Herb's. Call early for choice.

I guarantee the quality of my gold watch cases, chains, gold rings, in fact all goods sold by me, to be exactly as represented.

The vote is being canvassed as we go to press. We will be able to give the result next week.

A solid 18 karet ladies' watch, richly ornamented and encrusted with diamonds, is among the novelties at C. H. Saake's jewelry store.

Don't wait until the last minute but secure your wax tapers and Chinese lanterns now while they are plenty, at Herb's.

We satisfy all our customers, we ask no bonus, and we pay over money on oans the moment notes are signed.

The change in time on the Manitoba makes it somewhat inconvenient for travelers. The train from St. Paul reaching here at 5:40 a. m. and leaving for St. Paul at midnight. They do say it is a "dandy" train though, but as yet few of our people have seen it.

A gold crescent, studded with diamonds and opal, is a unique pattern in scarf pins, at C. H. Saake's jewelry store.

Iver A. Krohn has rented the Scandinavian House and has thoroughly renovated it from cellar to garret. He has e-papered and re-furnished the bed rooms and says he is bound to keep the house up in first-class style if it takes the last dollar. He is prepared to furnish refreshments for farmers and their teams at the most reasonable rates.

I U. Jennings has houses and rooms and warehouse to rent and has for sale a good second hand coal stove, a second hand platform scales, a good two seated double buggy with thilsl pole. [24-tf]

Harry Falk is the only one in the C. O. D. who seems to be enjoying this weather with an exceeding great joy. Before the election he kept reminding Ed and Sam that "Harrison will be elected," but they reasoned among themselves, saying: "Go to now, weep and howl, for verily thou art a comely lad, but yet thou art only a lad, and what doest thou know about war? And verily they had the edge on the lad, for a season, for it was even as they had said unto him. But lo! Upon the 6th inst. the people did gather themselves together at the places wherein votes are wont to be cast, and they did smite the Philistines with a mighty smite and did route them horse, foot and dragoon, and now Harry mildly considers that he has the edge on the boys as he exultantly remarks unto them: "What's the matter with the kids?"

"Grandfather's hat" seems to fit very well after all.

Childrens suits from $1.00 to $10.00
C. O. D. Clothing House.

Very little wood finds its way to this market. So far, very little is needed to supply the demand this pleasant weather.

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbor to us.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

The Bulletin was "off" last week in its announcement that our jolly Sheriff would take a trip to Salt River. He don't have to.

Mrs. I. U. Jennings has returned from the east where she has been making observations and selections of the new styles of millinery to be worn and is prepared to serve her customers to their entire satisfation at her usual low prices. [24-tf]

The emphatic verdict of the people is that America is capable of taking care of its own interests without the interference of England.

We can save you 33⅓ per cent on all goods purchased in our line. Look us over and be convinced.

Mrs. Ellen Pierce and her daughter, Mrs. H. Holdridge, left for Fayette, Ohio, on Friday night to spend the winter. Herb will join them later on.

The prohibs are so paralized that they have forgotten to take down their Fisk and Brooks flag. They don't seem to realize that they are buried too deep for resurrection.

It will pay you to visit my store and inspect the wonderful display of Florentine and ivory statuary just received.
C. H. SAAKE,
Opposite Merchants' Nat'l Bank.

Dan Patterson came down from St. Hilaire last week to celebrate and called at THE JOURNAL office to encourage the printer by a paid up subscription in advance. By the way, we trust that all who can do so will do the same this fall, as we need all that is due us on subscription.

Best residence lots in the city and on your own terms; mind, ON YOUR OWN TERMS.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

Harry Attix is now a resident of the Fifth ward, having moved from Mentor about two weeks since. He has taken charge of E. D. Childs & Co's store where he may be found on deck at all hours of the day ready to attend to the wants of customers. He invites his many friends to call on him at his new place of business.

My doors are wide open to all to inspect my immense lines of jewelry, silverware, fancy goods, Florentine statuary, etc, and if you do not buy, you will still have conferred a favor upon me by your greeting. C. H. SAAKE.

W. N. Godfrey was down from Maple Bay last week to celebrate the glorious republican victory. He says that everybody is well satisfied with the result and if everybody had the usual crop of No. 1 Hard, there would be great rejoicing in the land. They are feeling good over their new road, anyhow, and getting ready for big crops next year.

The prohibs in the last fight sacrificed not only their party but their principles in their blind and malignant hatred to the republican party and a terrible awakening is theirs. They have learned that a campaign based on bitter hate does not pay, at least, and while the principle of prohibition is not dead, the third party, as a party, is too utterly dead for any further use.

I can truthfully say that my store contains the largest and best selection of goods, suitable for holiday presents, that was ever shown in this city.
C. H. SAAKE, Jeweler.

About 400 of our people went over to Grand Forks on Saturday evening last to help the Dakotians celebrate their sure prospects for admission into the union at an early day. Bonfires, speeches and a monster parade were the order of the day, while everything was wild. Our band paraded the streets after their arrival home at about two o'clock Sunday morning, waking many of our citizens to a realizing sense of the situation.

On all loans we make, interest payable at our office in Crookston.
STEENERSON & McMANUS.

Last week the barn of Martin Jensen was discovered to be in flames and was totally destroyed, together with a quantity of oats, wheat and machinery. Some stock in the barn was rescued. It was supposed by the neighbors that the fire was set by Mr. Jensen himself in a crazy freak, but Mr. Jensen, who appears to be in his right mind, emphatically denies this report. He says that a threshing crew had been using the barn to sleep in, but as there had been no one in it for some 12 hours previous to the time fire was discovered, it would seem impossible that this could have been the origin of the fire. It seems to be one of those mysterious events that is past finding out.

Hurrah for Old Polk!

A CLEAN SWEEP

By Rousing Majorities!

Total Vote 5,448.

Harrison's Plurality 1,388.

Merriam's Plurality 1,364!

(CARRY THE NEWS TO GILMAN,)

Comstock's Plurality 1,371!

(CARRY THE NEWS TO CANNING.)

Roberts' Plurality 845!

(GO TELL O. L. LARSON.)

THE OFFICIAL COUNT.

As we go to press the full result is no announced. However we have the following glorious result:

Total number of votes cast, 5,448.

In 1886, McGill received 2,625; Ames 2,019 and Childs 234. The third party makes a gain of 406 votes.

On the county ticket Paulsrud receives 371 plurality, Lucken receives 1,084 plurality and a clear majority over all of 116. In the First district J. P. Johnson gets a plurality of 176 votes, in spite of the fraudulent attempt to beat him by a misleading poster which represented that he had withdrawn.

Mr. Elliot leads his lady competitor by 1,762 majority, receiving 3,854 to her 2,092. The balance of the officers are not in doubt being elected by handsome majorities, Christianson receiving 1,637 plurality.

GLORY ENOUGH FOR ONE DAY!

Geo. Bunzy was down from Maple Bay this week. Had poor luck with his wheat this year from blight.

I make a specialty of doing first-class watch and jewelry repairing. All work warranted and perfect satisfaction guaranteed. C. H. SAAKE,
Opposite Merchants' Nat'l Bank.

A wealth of illustrations of the highest quality adorns the pages of the American Agriculturist for November, making it one of the finest and most useful issues of this sterling magazine ever published. The leading article describes the lakeside farm and herd of Holstein-Friesian cattle and thoroughbred Clydesdale, Hambletonian and French coach horses. The numerous illustrations of famous cattle and horses are reproduced direct from life, without the intervention of mechanical engraving, thus making the pictures so natural and true to life as to really mark a new departure in live stock illustration.

On the evening that the returns were coming in an accident happened to Hon. H. Steenerson that might have deprived the Northwest of a future Congressman, but fortunately resulted only in a few painful bruises and cuts. He was receiving the news with other loyal republicans, and, having occasion to go through Max Ericsson's saloon, he walked into an open trap door, falling into the cellar. For some time he lost all interest in elections and all subunary matters, but after he had been taken home he came to himself and began to inquire after the latest news from the front. For several days he felt pretty sore over his tumble but is now getting around all right.

The issues of the St. Paul Globe since election, have been the best ever issued from that office. We suppose this is on the theory that a good Indian is always a dead Indian. During the campaign the Globe was filled with charges of corruption against the Hon. W. R. Merriam. The people showed how much stock they take in the Globe by giving Mr. Merriam a rousing majority of over 23,000, and now the Globe should gracefully acknowledge the corn and apologize to Mr. Merriam and his friends for its shameful course, for it is shameful to malign a man as the Globe did him, simply for political effect.

One of the worst defeated men, or one who feels the defeat the most keenly, is W. G. Deacon, of the St. Vincent New Era, because he is sincere in his faith in the democratic party. He believes that is the party of the people and mourns the defeat as a national calamity. Just how he can believe in the honesty and sincerity of the democratic party in the light of its past and present history, we fail to see, but we do think the Deacon is honest and sincere himself, and that the future is full of pleasant surprises for him when he begins to realize the fact that the government is now in safer hands, in better hands for the welfare, not only of the laboring classes, but of all others. Now the great territory of Dakota will receive its just dues. Under democracy it did not and would not. The utterance of Mr. Thurman himself, when he said that he regretted the result, "because now the republicans would admit Dakota and other territories and thus perpetuate their reign," gives the snap dead away and shows conclusively that the territories were kept out solely for political reasons, millions of people denied their right of suffrage in order to perpetuate the reign of democracy! Not only that, but in the south people are denied their rights, or cheated out of them for the same purpose. How the good Deacon, or any other honest man, can repose so much confidence in such a party is beyond our comprehension, but it proves that the good Deacon is not too old to learn, and that the light of future events will show him that this great victory is in reality a grand victory for the very people for whom the Deacon has so long and faithfully labored (in the wrong direction.) You will find, Deacon, that the interests of the people will be far better subserved under the republican government than under democratic misrule, and, if that is what you are really after, you have got it.

"A Happy Combination," one might style Peterson's Magazine for December. Pictures, stories, fashions, work-table designs, medical and household recipes, are all found among its contents, and each of its departments is a model of excellence. It is no wonder that Peterson keeps its place at the head of family magazines. Each new volume contains some fresh and attractive feature. Increasing popularity only spurs it on to increased effort. Its hold on public favor grows stronger year by year. Any family in which Peterson is not taken should examine this number. Other magazines content themselves with wood illustrations, but, besides these, Peterson gives this month two fine steel engravings. Its list of contributors is a warrant for the excellence of its stories. The wife of our former vice-consul at Paris writes the letter describing the newest French styles. The medical articles are from the pens of a leading physician and a noted trained nurse, and its fashion and home departments are directed by women whose names have for years been household words. Terms two dollars a year; 2 copies for $3.50; 3 copies for $4.50; 5 copies for $8.00, with elegant premiums for getting up clubs. Sample copies free to those desiring to get up clubs. Address "Peterson's Magazine," 306 Chestnut St., Philapelphia.

Col. Graves For Speaker.

Duluth Tribune.

The high esteem in which Col. Graves is held by the people of this legislative district is shown by the fact that, while having quite a popular gentleman for an opponent, he has run ahead even of Harrison and Morton. His majority in the district is likely to be between 5,000 and 6,000, and this large majority will not be any drawback to him when making his canvass for the speakership. By the way, his chances for securing that position are exceedingly encouraging. It is believed that the entire Fifth congressional district will be solid for him, and he also has many strong and influential friends scattered all over the state who will do their best for him.

Of course it would be a compliment for Duluth to have her member chosen as speaker, but what Duluth cares most for is not a mere compliment, but practical results. The speaker, if he has ability, shrewdness and tact as we all know that Colonel Graves has, can have as much influence in the legislature as half a dozen members; and when we have only one member in a district that is fairly entitled to two senators and three or four representatives and as we have many important matters demanding attention, it is to the interests of Duluth that one man should secure a position in which he can do us the most good.

Hurrah for our side!

The election passed off very quietly. The prohibs could not have wished for a more orderly set of voters. Not a drop of liquor or a drunken man seen here the whole day long.

Below is the vote of Reis township: Harrison 30, Cleveland 9, Fisk 13. State officers about the same. A good deal of cutting was done on the county ticket. Elliot received more votes than any one of the county officers—40 to his opponents 14.

Webb Murphey received a telegram on the 6th, from Ohio, saying that his wife who had gone there for her health, was dying. He left that evening. We all sympathize with him in his sorrow.

A. D. LeFave is visiting relatives in the northeastern part of the county.

The happiest young folks that we have seen for some time we met on Saturday evening at the residence of Mrs. H. B. Budd, where she entertained them very pleasantly. Dancing, instrumental and vocal music, were the principal features of the evening's entertainment. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Ohl, C. E. Ford, Jr., James Carey, Bert Murphey, J. W. Page, the Misses Webb's and Miss Mary Murphy. EDNA.

The board of county commissioners was in session last week.

The tariff will now be revised upon the proper basis for the interests of the people.

With the government fully republican we may now look with confidence for better times.

George Reynolds came up last week to see his father, the Judge, who has been worse again.

The democratic organs don't seem to be rejoicing very much nowadays. They banked heavily upon the third party and lo, their calculations came to naught.

S. M. Hoff was down from St. Hilaire last week. He says the new mill is all ready for business and at work on the new crop. A good proportion of the wheat in that vicinity is No. 1 Hard, which is a bonanza to the fortunate possessors this year.

The Fosston paper says that A. D. Stephens has purchased a quarter section adjoining that city and that E. C. Davis has been up making a townsite of it. He is now at work grading side tracks for the R. R. Co., who are putting in 8,000 feet. Fosston will boom while it is the terminus of the road.

Ole Thompson, of Hill River, gave THE JOURNAL a pleasant call while in the city last week. Says the new road will hardly reach Fosston by the 15th, owing to various delays, but he thinks it will be fully completed and in running order next week. This will be a welcome change for the citizens of the Thirteen Towns.

J. D. Knudson, candidate for county commissioner on the prohibition ticket, in the First District, was in from King last week. He says that a fraud was perpetrated upon the voters in some towns in that district by a poster signed by S. P. Johnson. Said poster purported to be a resignation by the republican candidate, J. P. Johnson, and advised his friends to vote for the democratic nominee.

A private letter from the Hon. Knute Nelson re-iterates his intention of retiring from public life at the expiration of his term of service. Mr. Nelson says that the Red Lake Indian Reservation will soon be opened to settlement, probably next summer. It would seem that Mr. Nelson has no desire to go into the Senate or to accept a cabinet position if offered. Mr. Nelson has served his constituency so ably and honestly, that he has only to accept any position within the gift of the people to get it, and his decision to relinquish public life is to be regretted as a public loss. The district is to be congratulated upon the selection of so worthy a successor as Mr. Comstock will prove to be.

Factory Hands Perish in the Flames—A Long List of the Missing, Who May be in the Ruins.

The most dangerous and fatal fire that has happened in Rochester, N. Y. for many years occurred recently, and the loss of life is expected to reach between fifty and sixty. A general alarm was sounded on fire being discovered in the packing room of the Rochester Steam Gauge and Lantern works, employing a large number of men. So busy has the factory been lately that the men have been working night and day to catch up on orders. The building to which the fire was confined was six stories high. About sixty men were working in the three upper floors, and as soon as they found there was fire underneath them they began to leap from the windows, ignoring the fire escapes with balconies on the south side of the building. In these leaps quite a number of men were injured, many of them so seriously that they will probably die. By 9 o'clock the building was entirely destroyed, and five men had been taken out dead; sixteen were seriously injured, fourteen were entirely safe, and the rest unaccounted for, of whom quite a number are unknown by name. The scenes at the fire were heartrending, and prominent among those who were present after the fire were three priests in the surplices who administered spiritual comfort to those who were in a dying condition. The factory was built on the high bank, on the west side of the Genesee river, and was a difficult one for the firemen to get it, owing to one side being entirely closed to them.

Until the books are examined, it will not be possible to tell who were actually at work and how many persons are lost. Among those saved were John Platts, who escaped by sliding from the sixth floor. He says there were thirty persons at work on that floor, and three were saved—Robert and Horatio Hall and Joseph Smith. Platt thinks that about ten others escaped with him. The lantern works, with stock and machinery, is a total loss, estimated at about $225,000. The insurance is $179,000. the cause of the fire is a mystery. Two men went to work after supper and all seemed to be right then. Soon afterward Jacob Diehl, the watchman, while making his usual rounds discovered flames making way up through the floor. He had barely time to give the alarm when he was surrounded by the flames, but he succeeded in making the danger known to the men on the fourth, fifth and sixth floors. These at once realized their position and made their way from the building, but before all got out the structure was a seething mass of fire. There was not the slightest chance of escape by the usual doors of exite, and the windows were at once utilized for the purpose. The majority of the workmen lost their heads and began to jump instead of taking the fire ladders that were attached to the building. It is believed that a number of men are buried in the ruins, but at present it is impossible to be sure of this.

The Last and Worst London Murder.

The london murder fiend has added another to his list of victims. The body of a woman, cut into pieces, was discovered in a house on Dorset street, Spitalfields. The police are endeavoring to track the murderer with the aid of bloodhounds. The appearance of the remains was frightful, and the mutilation was even greater than in the previous cases. The head had been severed and placed beneath one of the arms. The ears and nose had been cut off. The body had been torn from the thighs. The womb and other organs were missing. The skin had been torn off the forehead and cheeks. One hand had been pushed into the stomach. The victim, like all the others, was a prostitute. She was married and her husband was a porter. They had lived together at spasmodic inervals. Her name is believed to have been Lizzie Fisher, but to most of the habitues of the haunts she visited she was known as Mary Jane. She had a room in the house where she was murdered. The murdered woman told a companion the evening before that she was without money and would commit suicide if she did not obtain a supply. It has been learned that a man, respectably dressed, accosted the victim and offered her money. They went to her lodgings on the second floor of the Dorset street house. No noise was heard during the night and nothing was known of the murder until the landlady went to the room early next morning to ask for her rent. The first thing she saw on entering the room was the woman's breasts and viscera lying on a table. Dorset-street is short and narrow and is situated near Mitre square and Hanbury street.

The murder is undeniably a continuation of the series which was for awhile interrupted for want of opportunity or inclination. In this case the murderer worked surely, as is made evident by the fact that the killing was done in a room fronting on the street, on the ground floor, and within a few yards of a temporary police station, whence officers issued hourly to patrol the district. Although the metropolitan police system is not yet discredited, the bloodhound theory is entirely thrown out, since the murder was not discovered till 10 o'clock in the morning, while the streets were teaming with people and traffic was going on uninterruptedly. Gen. Sir Charles Warren was early on the scene, and told a reporter that all the precaution in the world could not prevent the work of such murderers. The sole chance remaining to the police he said, was to catch them red handed, and their chance of tactics increased the difficulty. In the open air, where the killing has been done hitherto, the chance of their apprehension was slight, but in the case of indoor murder, such as the last, the hope of arresting the perpetrator was almost barren of fruition. This latest murder will undoubtedly cause a large number of arrests on suspicion, but that the monster will be brought to bay is a matter of extreme doubt, since he has left no clues not worked over by the officers investigating the previous cases. The most annoying feature of the case is that the arrest of a number of innocent persons on suspicion will have to be repeated. The opinion of Archibald Forbes and Mr. Winslow that the assassin is a homicidal maniac is confirmed by the latest murder, and the prediction has become general that another will soon follow. The brutality of the mutilation to which the last body was subjected surpassed all the others. In the room to which the corpse was taken, chunks of flesh and portions of the viscera were strewn upon the floor and the dissecting table, and the stomach of one of the surgeons gave way to the spectacle.

In the house of commons, Mr. Conybeare asked the question whether, if it was true that another woman had been murdered in London, Gen. Warren, the chief of the metropolitan police, ought not to be superceded by an officer accustomed to investigate crime. The question was greeted by cries of "oh! oh!" The speaker called "order! order!" and said that notice must be given of the question in the usual way.

Shocking Calamity.

A special from Pittsburg, Kan., says that the most dreadful disaster in the history of Kansas occurred on Friday, Nov. 9th. When the men were preparing to leave off their work at Shaft No. 2 at Frontenac, a suburb of Pittsburg, a terrible explosion was heard, that shook the earth for a great distance and completely shattered the shaft. Upon investigation it was found that 160 men were within the mine at the time of the explosion. Being 112 feet below the surface, it is almost certain that all are dead. The only exceptions were two men in a car coming up, and being near the top of the shaft, managed to escape. Pittsburg is in center of the coal mines of Southern Kansas, and is about one hundred miles south of Kansas City, on the Fort Scott & Gulf road. The violence of the shock was so great as to hurl dishes from shelves and demolish chimneys. Half an hour after the explosion the villagers who were preparing to go to the mines, were startled by a ragged, bleeding man, who almost staggered into the arms of the searchers. He said that Shaft No. 2 had been destroyed by an explosion, and that all the men in the mine at the time, except himself and a Dane whom he left bleeding at the mouth of the pit, were undoubtedly dead. Horses were quickly harnessed to wagons, and in a few minutes the villagers were hurrying through a fierce snow and sleet storm which was raging. At the mouth of the mine the tremendous force of the explosion was apparent. There were huge seams in the earth and the timbers of the hoisting apparatus were shivered and burned. Foul gasses were escaping. The Dane who escaped with the man who had alarmed the villagers, lay in the mud with his face covered with blood. For a long time it was thought he was dead, but he regained consciousness in a few hours and is now at his home. He cannot speak and does not know what caused the explosion. His clothes are in ribbons. The man who reached the village with the first tidings of the disaster, and who accompanied the rescuers to the mine, said the men were about to quit work for the day when the explosion occurred. Together with the Dane he had ridden in the car to the top of the shaft, when the earth seemed to snap beneath him, and the next thing he realized was the splashing of the snow and water upon his face as he lay with his comrade in the wreckage above the mine. Big fires were built near the mouth of the pit and beside these blazing piles the women of the entombed miners placed their children while they, themselves, tried by all kinds of entreaties to induce the miners from the other shaft to enter the pit and rescue their relatives. One rescuing party started down the shaft at 7 o'clock, but was forced to turn back, owing to the foul air. Another attempt was made at 9 o'clock, but the plucky rescuers were again forced to abandon their work. They could hear no sound from the chambers below, and this leads old miners to believe that all the men in the shaft have perished. Other attempts will be made to reach the entombed men. Those who started down the shaft early in the evening say that the shock has destroyed whole drifts, and that it is probable that the men in the lower levels are buried beneath tons of slate. Black damp is supposed to have caused the explosion. Most of the miners at these shafts came originally from Illinois and Pennsylvania.

The anniversary of the hanging of the anarchists was observed by their Chicago sympathizers, but not within the limits of the city. Police regulations prevented any procession or flying of red bunting, and there was no outbreak of any kind. About five thousand people, men, women and children, gathered individually at the depot, and two big trains carried them to Waldheim cemetery. On the way to the cemetery the crowd resembled anything rather than people bent upon a melancholy errand. Joking and chaffing was the order of the day all the way out. None of the persons who gained notoriety through connection with the anarchists' trial were present, except Spies' sister Gretchen and the daughters of George Engel. One thing was an unqualified success—the floral tributes were of the most elaborate character, and included contributions from thirteen different societies. Among the flowers blood-red ribbons were conspicious, and the inscriptions accompanying them where such as "For Freedom and Right;" "To the Pioneers of Truth and justice;" and "To the Martyrs, Our Thanks." The first speech was by Robert Retzel of Detroit. Compared with the rantings heard a year ago on the same spot, his remarks were tame. In fact, there was not a single incendiary phrase in his entire speech. Then fifty children from the socialist Sunday school of the city sang in childish mechanical fashion a hymn in praise of the "martyrs." When the sound of the children's voices had ceased the chairman (George Schilling) proceeded to that which was to be the central attraction and attention, a letter from Albert R. Parsons to his children, addressed to them with a request that it should not be opened or read until the first anniversary of his execution. Perfect quiet came over the assembly as the letter was read, as follows:

Dungeon No. 7, Cook County Jail, Chicago, Ill, Nov. 9, 1887. To my darling, precious little children, Albert R. Parsons, Jr., and his sister, Lulu Ida Parsons: As I write this word I blot out your name with a tear. We never meet again. Oh, my children, how deeply, dearly your father loves you. We show our love by living for our loved ones. We also prove our love by dying, when necessary, for them. Of my life and the cause of my unnatural and cruel death you will learn from others. Your father was a self offered sacrifice on the altar of liberty and happiness. To you I leave the legacy of an honest name, and duty well done. Preserve it, emulate it, be true to yourselves and you cannot, then, be false to others. Be industrious and sober. Your mother—oh, she is the grandest, noblest of women—love, honor and obey her. My children, my precious ones, I request you to read this parting message on each recurring anniversary of my death in remembrance of him who dies not alone for you, but for the children yet unborn. Bless you, my darlings farewell. Your father,

ALBERT PARSONS.

The letter was something of a disappointment to the listeners. There was no approach to any of the usual catchwords of the revolutionists. It was too plain and fatherlike. Hence the effect was not notable.

What the Republicans Will Do.

If it shall be found that the Republicans have the house by a working majority they will have control of the entire government, for there is no longer any question that they will control the senate. Then if the statements of those who ought to know are to be relied upon, the Republicans among other things, will endeavor to carry out the following:

First—To postpone the consideration of the subject of the reduction of the revenue and all tariff legislation until the Republicans shall be in full possession of the government.

Second—to enact laws to admit at the earliest possible moment two states in Dakota and one in Montana, Washington Territory and possibly Wyoming.

Third—To convene congress, possibly, in extra session on March 4 in order to organize the house and to give effect to the administration policy as early as practicable.

Fourth—To consider and if possible to pass the Blair educational bill and any other measures which receive the support of Northern Republicans as to which the Southern Democrats are divided.

Fifth—To attempt generally to enact laws which will receive support of a considerable portion of the South and to seek to enlist that portion of the Southern Democracy which favors protection and educational measures in movements which it is expected will tend to render the South less solid.

Sixth—The admission of Oklahoma as a territory and its subsequent admission as a state if it shall appear that the population is likely to be Republican.

Seventh—The extinction of polygamy in Utah and when that shall have been accomplished the admission of Utah as a state.

Eighth—The passage of the tonnage bill of the present congress or of some bill which will encourage ship building.

Ninth—To devise, if practicable, further measures which shall give the federal government a better supervision of national elections within the states, and especially in the Southern states.

Riot in Madrid.

In anticipation of the arrival of Senor Canovas del Castillo from Seville, a strong force of police and military was posted along the streets through which the Conservative leader was expected to pass on his way from the railway station to his residence. Thousands of Republicans collected at the station at an early hour, and the arrival of Senor Canovas was a signal for a hostile outburst. The mob surrounded and followed his carriage, hooting and throwing stones. The windows of the carriage were smashed by flying missiles. Senora Canovas, who accompanied her band, was struck by a stone but not seriously injured. When the carriage reached the Prado the gendarmes surrounded it in order to protect the occupants from violence. Similar scenes of disorder occurred outside of the residence of Senor Canovas. In order to escape from the mob he drove to the house of his brother-in-law, the marquis of Sotomayer. The crowd continued the demonstration in front of the Conservative club and the Conservative journals. At the Epoca building the mob again became violent and every window in the place was smashed. Throughout the disturbance there was no collision between the people and the police nor was there any fighting.

Snow Storms in Canada.

A snow storm and gale, which, in severity has seen few equals in Canada even in winter, set in Thursday night Nov. 8, and continued until Sunday night. It extended over the whole of Quebec and the maritime provinces. Dispatches from lower Quebec say that 2½ feet of snow has fallen all along the lower St. Lawrence, and that serious fears are entertained that there has been a large loss of life among the fishermen on both shores of the gulf. At Mananea, a lumber laden schooner is ashore and the crew were in the rigging all night. They were rescued badly frost-bitten. One of them cannot survive. The steamer Polma, attempting to run up the north branch of the Saginayo, was compelled to put into Trinity bay, where she dragged her anchors, and went ashore on the rocks. The captain is reported drowned. It is known that a large number of fishing boats were below Anticost, but none of them have been heard of since. Telegraph wires are down and trains are delayed by the snow, and communication with the gulf signal station is practically impossible.

A CHEST OF GOLD.

Dr. Talmage Speaks About the Wonderful Sacred Chest of the Ancients.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. Nov. 4.—[Special.]—At the Tabernacle this morning the Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage, D. D., expounded some passages of Scripture about ancient politics. He gave out the hymn:

"Arm of the Lord, awake, awake,
Put on thy strength, the nations shake."

The doctor's text was: "Two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it,"—Exodus 37:1. He said:

Look at it—the sacred chest of the ancients. It was about five feet long, three feet wide, and three feet high. It was within and out of pure gold. On the top of it stood two angels facing each other with outspread wings. In that sacred box was the law, and there were in it a great many precious stones. With that box went the fate of the nation. Carried in front of the host, the waters of the Jordan parted. Divinely charged, costly precious, momentous box. No unholy hands might lay hold of it. It was called the ark of the covenant. But you will understand it was a box, the most precious box of the ages. Where is it now? Gone forever. Not a crypt of church or museum of the world has a fragment of it.

But is not this nation God's chosen people? Have we not passed through the Red sea? Have we not been led with a pillar of fire by night? Has this nation no ark of the covenant? Yes, the ballot box, the sacred chest of the nation, the ark of the American covenant.

In it is the law, in it is the divine and the human will, in it is the fate of the nation. Carried in front of her host again and again the waters of national trouble have parted. Mighty ark of the covenant, the American ballot box! It is a very old box.

Tell me what will be the fate of the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, and I will tell you what will be the fate of this nation. Give the people once a week or once in four years an opportunity to express their political sentiments, and you practically avoid insurrection and revolution.

Either give them the ballot or they will take the sword. Without the ballot-box there can be no free republican institutions. Milton visiting in Italy noticed that on the sides of Vesuvius gardeners and farmers were at work while the volcano was in eruption, and he asked them if they were safe. "Yes," said the farmers and the gardeners, "it is safe; all the danger is before the eruption; then comes earthquake and terror, but just as soon as the volcano begins to pour forth lava we all feel at rest." It is the suppression of political sentiment, the suppression of public opinion, that makes moral earthquake and national earthquake. Let public opinion pour forth, and that gives satisfaction, and that gives peace, and that gives permanency to good government. And yet, though the ballot-box is the sacred chest and the ark of the American covenant, you know as well as I know it has its sworn antagonists, and I propose this morning in God's name and as a Christian patriot to set before you the names of some of the sworn enemies of this sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box.

First, I remark, ignorance is a mighty foe. Other things being equal, the more intelligence a man has the better he is qualified to exercise the right of suffrage. You have been 10, 15, 20, 30 years studying American institutions, you have canvassed all the great questions about tariff and home rule and all the educational questions, and everything in American politics you are well acquainted with. You consider yourself competent to cast a vote in November, and you are competent. You will take your position in the line of electors, you will wait for your turn to come, the judge of election will announce your name, you will cast your vote and pass out. Well done.

But right behind you there will come a man who cannot spell the name of comptroller, or attorney or mayor. He cannot write, or if he can write he uses a small "i" for the personal pronoun. He could not tell on which side of the Alleghany mountains Ohio is. Educated canary birds, educated horses know more than he. He will cast his vote and it will balance your vote. His ignorance is as mighty as your intelligence. That is not right. All men of fair mind will acknowledge that it is not right. Until a man can read the Declaration of Independence and the constitution of the United States, and calculate the interest of the American debt, and know the difference between a Republican form of government and a monarchy or a despotism, he is unfit to exercise the right of suffrage at any ballot-box between Key West and Alaska.

In 1872, in England, there were 2,000,000 children who ought to have been in school. There were only 1,333,000, in other words about 50 per cent., and of the 50 per cent not more than 5 per cent got anything worthy the name of an education. Now, take that foreign ignorance and add it to our American ignorance, and there will be in November thousands and thousands of people who are no more qualified to exercise the right o sffrage than to lecture on astronomy. How are these things to be corrected? By laws of compulsory education well executed. I go in for a law which, after giving fair warning for a few years, shall make ignorance a crime. There is no excuse for ignorance on these subjects in this land, where the common schools make knowledge as free as the fresh air of heaven. I would have a board of examination seated beside the officers of registration, and let them decide whether the men who came up to vote have any capacity to be monarchs in a land where we are all monarchs. One of the most awful foes of the American ballot-box today is popular ignorance. Educate the people, give them an opportunity to know and understand what they do. If they will not take the education, deny them the vote.

Another powerful enemy of this sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is spurious voting. In 1880 in Brooklyn, there were a thousand names recorded of persons who had no residence here, and if there were a thousand attempted fraudulent votes in the best city on the continent, what may we expect in cities not so fortunate? What a grand thing is the law of registration? Without it elections in this country would be a farce. There must be a scrutiny on this subject. The law must have keenest twists for the neck of repeaters. Something more than slight fine and short imprisonment. It is an attempt at the assassination of the republic, when a man attempts to put in a spurious vote. In olden times when men laid unholy hands on the ark of the covenant they dropped down dead. Witness Uzzah. And when men attempt to put unholy hands on the American ballot box, the ark of American covenant, they deserve extermination.

Another powerful foe of this sacred chest is intimidation.

Corporations sometimes demand that their employes vote in this and that way. It is skillfully done. It is not positively in so many words demanded, but the employe understands he will be frozen out of the establishment unless he votes as the firm does. So you can go into villages where there are establishments with hundreds and thousands of employes, and having found out the politics of the head men in the factory, you can tell which way the election is going. Now, that is damnable. If in any precinct in the United States a man cannot vote as he pleases, there is something awfully wrong.

How do you treat that employe who votes differently from what you do? Oh, you say you do not interfere with his right of suffrage. But you call him into your private office, and you find fault with his work, and after a while you tell him there is an uncle or an aunt, or a niece, or a nephew that must have that position. You do not say it is because he voted this or that way, but he knows and God knows it is. If that man has given to you in hard work an equivalent for the wages you pay him, you have no right to ask anything else of him. He sold you his work; he did not sell you his political or religious principles. But you know as well as I do there is sometimes on that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, a shadow corporate or monopolistic.

I do not wonder at the vehemence of Lord Chief Justice Holt, of England, when he said; "Let the people vote fairly. Interferance with a man's vote is in behalf of this or that party. I give you notice that if an offender against the law comes before me, I will charge the jury to make him pay well for it." No shadow pultocratic, or mobocratic, or capitalistic. Every man voting in his own way—God and his own conscience the only dictator.

Another powerful foe of that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is bribery.

You know something of the hundreds of thousands of dollars that were expended to carry Indiana in 1880. You know something of the vast sums of money expended in Brooklyn and New York in other years to carry elections. Bribery is one of the disgraces of this country. And there will be more money expended in bribery this autumn's election than in any previous election. It is often the case that a man is nominated for office with reference to his capacity to provide money for the elections or with reference to his capacity to command money from others. You know the names of men who have at different times gone into the gubernatorial chair of congressional office buying their way all through. I tell you no news. Your patriotic heart has been pained again and again with it.

Very often it is not money that bribes, but it is office. "You make me President and I'll make you a cabinet officer; you make me Governor and I'll make you surveyor-general; you make me mayor and I'll put you on the water; you give me position and I'll give you position." That is the form of bribe often and often in these great cities. I do not say it is in our city, but you know again and again throughout the land these have been the forms of bribe offered. So it is often the case that by the time a man comes to an office to which he has been elected, he is from the crown of head to the sole of foot mortgaged with pledges, and the man who goes to Albany or to Washington to get an office is applying for some position which was given away three months before the election. Two long lines of worm fence, one worm fence reaching to Albany and the other to Washington, and there a great many citizens astride the fence, and they are equally poised and they are waiting to see on which side there is most emolument, and on this side they get down. But bribery kicks both ways. It kicks the man that offers it and the man that takes it. Bribery today you will admit to be one of the mightest foes of the American ballot box.

Another great enemy of that sacred chest is defamation of character. Can you find out from the newspapers when two men are running for office which is the best? How often in the autumnal elections the good man is denounced and the bad man applauded, so that you can come sometimes to no just opinion as to who is the best man, and there are hundreds and thousands of electors who go up to vote so utterly befogged that they know not what they do. Is not that a fearful influence to be brought upon the ballot-box of this country? It has been so ever since the foundation of this government. Defamation of character.

Thomas Paine writes Washington a letter, and publishes it saying: "Treacherous in all private friendship and a hypocrite in public morals, the world will be puzzled to know whether we had better call you an apostate or an imposter, and whether you abandoned good morals, or never had any," That is Thomas Paine's opinion of George Washington.

My father told me that when Andrew Jackson was running for President of the United States, the whole land was flooded with coffin handbills—pictures of six dead men, in allusion to the six deserters whom Andrew Jackson had had shot, and all the pictorials of those times represented Jackson as taking his office from the hand of the devil.

I saw at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, in a museum, a prominent paper of 1884, which spoke of Henry Clay as a gambler, a libertine, and a murderer; and the manner in which he was defamed and the outrages which were heaped upon him may be well guessed from Mr. Clay's eulogy of his native state, Kentucky. He said: "When I seemed to be assailed by all the rest of the world, she interposed her broad and impenetrable shield, repelled the poisoned shafts that were aimed for my destruction, and vindicated my good name from every malignant and unfounded aspersion." Defamation! It is the curse of the American ballot-box. Just as soon as in the great cities a man is put up for office he is made the target. The fact that he is up is prima facie evidence that he must be brought down. His public life and his private life are scrutinized, and all the electric lights are turned down under such things. In every autumnal election the air is filled with carrion crows scenting carcasses. Caw! Caw! Caw! There are newspapers in the United States that in the great autumnal elections take wild license for liberty. They are filled with calumny. The editorial columns are stuffed with it. There are newspapers in the United States which in the great popular elections breakfast and dine and sup on indecency. They wallow in it. Swine like the mire. They give more for one quill-full of it than a whole hogshead of decent product. There are in these great autumnal elections men sitting in editorial chairs who write with a quill, not plucked from the stupid goose, or the sublime eagle, but from a turkey buzzard! Ghouls! Ghouls! They tip the city sewer into their editorial inkstands. Defamation of character is one of the curses of the American ballot-box today. In your great presidential elections who can tell from what he reads who is the man he ought to vote for? Bad men sometimes applauded, good men denounced.

Another powerful foe of the sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot box, is the rowdy and drunken caucus.

The ballot box does not give any choice to a man when the nominations are made in the back part of a groggery. When the elector comes up he has to choose between two evils. In some of the cities men have come to the ballot box to vote, and have found both names such a scaly, greasy, stenchful crew that they had no choice. You say vote for somebody outside. Then they throw away their vote. Christian men of New York and Brooklyn, honorable men, patriotic men, go and take possession of the caucuses. First having saturated your pocket handkerchief with cologne or some other disinfectant, go down to the caucus and take possession of it in the name of the Lord God Almighty and the American people, though after you come back you should have to hang your hat and coat on a line in the back yard for ventilation.

In some of the states politics have got so low that the nominees no more need good morals than they do a bath tub Snatch the ballot box from such men. Where is the David who will go forth and bring the ark of the covenant back from Kirjath-jearim? Do you not think politics have got to a pretty low ebb in our day when a Tweed could be sent to the Legislature of New York, and a John Morrissey, the prince of gamblers, could be sent to the American congress?

Now, how are these things to be remedied? Some say by a property qualification. They say that after a man gets a certain amount of property—a certain amount of real estate—he is financially interested in good government, and he becomes cautious and conservative. I reply, a property qualification would shut off from the ballot box a great many of the best men in this land. Literary men are almost always poor. A pen is a good implement to make the world better, but it is a very poor implement to get a livelihood ordinarily. I have known scores of literary men who never owned a foot of ground and never will own a foot of ground until they get under it. Professors of colleges teachers of schools, editors of newspapers ministers of religion, qualified in every possible way to vote, yet no worldly success. There has been many a man who has not had a house on earth who will have a mansion in heaven.

There are many who through accidents of fortune have come to great success while they are profound in their stupidity, as profound in their stupidity as a man of large fortune with whom I was crossing the ocean, who told me he was going to see the dykes of Scotland! When a member of my family asked a lady on her return from Europe if she had seen Mount Blanc, she replied: "Well, really, I don't know, is that in Europe?" Ignorance by the square foot. Property qualification will not do. The only way these evils will be eradicated will be by more thorough moralization and Christianization of the people. That ark of the covenant was carried into captivity to Kirjath-jearim, but one day the people hooked oxen to a cart, and they put this ark on the cart, and the cart was taken to Jerusalem—the ark of the covenant coming with the shouting and thanksgiving of the people. And though the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, our sacred chest, has been carried again and again into captivity by fraud and iniquity, and spurious voting, I believe it will be brought back yet by prayer and by Christian consecration, and will be set down in the midst of the temple of Christian patriotism. Whose responsibility? Yours and mine.

A poor soldier went to a hairdresser in London. He wanted to get back to the army. He had overrun his furlough, and he wanted some help to get back in quick transit. The money was given to the poor soldier, who said to the man who had offered the kindness: "I have nothing to give you in return but this little worn out receipt for making blacking." He gave it not thinking there was any value in it; but it yielded the man who took it $2,000,000, and was the foundation of one of the greatest estates in England. And that little vote, that insignificant vote which you take out of your pocket—insignificant in your sight and insignificant in the sight of others—may start an influence that will last all through the progress of this government.

I charge you, then, as American citizens to remember your responsibility on the first Tuesday of November. It will begin early, the snowstorm of suffrages. It will snow all day—snow on until noon, snow on until night. The flakes will fall in every town and village and neighborhood the white flakes: The octogenarian will come up, his hand trembling, and with spectacled eye he will scrutinize the vote and drop it and pass on. The young man who has been waiting for his time will come up, and proudly and blushingly deposit his first vote and pass on. The capitalist will come up with bediamoned finger and the laborer with hard fists, and the one vote will be as good as the other. Snowstorm of suffrages, and then these white flakes will be gathered together and compacted into an avalanche that will slide down in expression of the will of the people. Stand out of the way of it! In the awful sweep of this white avalanche let political fraud go down a thousand feet under.

You have not only a vote you have a prayer. The prayer may be mightier than the vote. Oh, as citizens of this beautiful city, and of this state, and of this nation, let us do our whole duty. We cannot live under any other form of government than that which God has given us in this country. The stars on our flag are not the stars of a thickening night, but the stars sprinkled amid the bars of morning cloud. We are going to have one government on this entire continent. Let the despotisms of Asia keep their feet off the Pacific coast, and let the tyrannies of Europe keep their feet off the Atlantic coast. We are going to have one government. Mexico will follow Texas into the Union, and Christianity and civilization will stand side by side in the halls of the Montezumas. And if not in our day, then in the day of our children, Yucatan and Central America will come in the dominion, while on the north Canada will be ours, not by conquest—oh, no, American and English swords may never clash blades—but we will woo our fair neighbor of the north, and then England will say to Canada. "You are old enough for the marriage day," and then turning, will say "Giant of the West, go take your bride." An then from Baffin's bay to the Carribean there will be one government under one flag, with one destiny—a free, undisputed, Christianized American continent. God save the city of Brooklyn! God save the commonwealth of New York! God save the Union.

Advice to a Bride.

In the first solitary hour after the ceremony, take the bridegroom and demand a solemn vow of him, and give him a vow in return. Promise one another sacredly never, not even in jest, to wrangle with each other; never to bandy words, or indulge in the least ill-humor.

Next promise each other sincerely and solemnly never to have a secret from each other under whatever pretext, with whatever excuse it may be. You must continually and every moment see clearly into each other's bosom. Even when one of you have committed a fault, wait not an instant, but confess it freely.

And as you keep nothing secret from each other, so, on the contrary, preserve the privacy of your house, married state, and heart from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, and all the world. You two, with God's help, build your own quiet world. Every third or fourth one whom you draw into it with you will form a party, and stand between you two.

Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your souls will grow, as it were, together, and at last will become as one. Ah! if many a young pair had on their wedding-day known this secret how many marriages would be happier than, alas! they now are!

A lady was asked to reveal the secret by which she had always preserved the attention and affection of her husband. "It is," answered she, "in doing every thing that pleases him, and bearing patiently everything that does not please me."—Selected.

Painting War as It Is.

From the New York Home Journal.

Vasili Verestchagin, the Russian painter now in New York, is the first great painter of battle scenes who has dared to paint war as it is and not as it is supposed to be. He does not intend that his paintings should suggest any wild dreams of glory, that they should inspire admiration for the soldier or envy of his career. This is not his object, but the reverse. He believes that when war is stripped of its glory it will cease to be popular and the era of peace, though arbitration, inaugurated. Hence what many critics throughout Europe have termed his horrible realism. The spirit of his war pictures is best expressed in his own words: "Why should war be idealized and rendered beautiful when it is the most awful, blood-curdling institution on the face of the earth? Ladies who have visited my pictures have asked me whether such scenes as I had depicted were not exaggerated and why I had not infused more of the romance and chivalry of war. I replied that when I went on a field of battle I saw little romance and perhaps less chivalry. What greeted my eyes were heaps of dead and dying, faces distorted with agony, torn and dismembered frames, pools of blood—death, suffering and contusion everywhere. This impression it was that I threw upon the canvas."

The Judge Modified His Sentence.

One of the keenest things ever said on the bench is attributed to Judge Walton. While holding a term of the Supreme Court at Augusta, he sentenced a man to seven years in prison for a grave crime. The respondent's counsel asked for an investigation of the sentence on the ground that the prisoner's health was very poor. "Your Honor," said he, "I am satisfied that my client can not live out half that term, and I beg of you to change the sentence." Well, under those circumstances," said the Judge, "I will change the sentence. I will make it for life, instead of seven years." It is needless to add that the respondent chose to abide by the original sentence, which the Judge permitted him to elect.—Lewiston Journal.

While section men were burning grass around the railroad bridge at Marshall a three-year-old child of A. Christianson's ran into the flames, burning it so severely that its recovery is doubtful.

The West Duluth brick works have closed down for the season. During the winter the capacity of the works will be doubled and a complete system of steam heating will be put in, requiring 15,000 feet of pipe.

Mrs. George W. Battles, of Stillwater, is circulating a petition for the pardon of Henry Taylor. Over eight years ago Taylor was convicted at Duluth for murdering an Indian and sentenced for life. The sentence was subsequently commuted to ten years. The convict has now about eighteen months to serve.

The election in St. Paul showed conclusively that, under the existing circumstances, the new election law is not a complete success. While there is no doubt that it precludes any possibility of fraud, as a time-saving institution it is remarkably deficient. In some of the districts, where the total registration was less than 500, it worked comparatively well, but in the districts where the registration was between nine hundred and thousand, many were turned away without being able to cast their votes because of the slowness in the judges in receiving the ballots. In the smaller districts, where the judges were young and native born Americans, quick to catch a name and to find it in the lists, the average time consumed by a voter in voting was forty-five seconds. In other districts, where there was a long line during the entire day, where the judges were old and not very rapid, it took from one minute to two and a half minutes for each voter.

From Top to Botton.

A representative American thinker lately said to me, that, contrasting the operation of Anglo-Saxon institutions in England with those in America, the most important result, in his opinion, with which we may credit ourselves on this continent is the facility of individual movement from the bottom of the top of the social scale. This is a broad, patent fact, which underlies and largely caused that hopeful energy which permeates even the lower strata of society in American, and forms a striking contrast to the social inertia and consequent mental inactivity of the lover slasses of England.

I think, however, that we are bound to qualify our satisfaction on this point by the edually manifest fact that the facility of descent from the top to the bottom of the same social scale is infinitely greater in America than in England. Taking our society as a whole, there is comparatively little conservation of force and culture along family lines. The weakening influences of wealth and high social position on the young have no adequate corrective. The ruling names in the society or politics of one generation seldom repeat themselves in the next. Eaoch generation has to hew its best class out of rough material taken from beneath. Now, success in life which fails to transmit as an inheritance force or culture or superiority of some kind has failed in that point which makes success most of all desirable. Society itself is an immense loser where the results of success end with the individual. It is a national calamity when the grand advantage given by wealth for attaining personal excellence are thrown away.—Georfie R. Parkin in The Century.

Do Not Stuff a Cold.

The man who originated the oft-quoted and unscientific maxim—"Feed a cold and starve a fever"—either did not understand what he was writing about, or he has been widely misunderstood, to the great injury of multitudes who have acted on the absurd maxim. Presuming that the author of it was a physician who knew something of the nature of a cold, and the action of remedies, he must have spoken subjunctively, and not imperatively. And then it would read: If you stuff a cold, the consequences will be that you will be thrown into a fever, as a result of the stuffing treatment of the cold; and then you will have to starve the fever. This is a true and sensible interpretation of this commonly received maxim, which has done as much harm as any of the thousand and one of the popular errors which prevail on medical subjects. If it cannot be explained in the manner mentioned, it must be remanded to the dark ages of ignorance and superstition, and classed with lunar and stellar influences over the human body, witchcraft and other absurdities long since exploded in the progress of true science.

Without dwelling on the nature and causes of colds, or on what physicians call the pathology of these disorders, I will say that a low, or even starvation diet for a few days, with free drinking of warm, mildly stimulating teas is better for a cold than any drug or combination of drugs. If with this a warm bath, or a hot foot-bath, is taken, little more will be needed. Nine cases in ten of colds can be broken up in their early stage by a hot foot or rather leg-bath, keeping the bath as hot as it can be borne until perspiration arises. After the bath, drink a half pint of hot lemonade and go to bed. In obstinate cases take from five to ten grains of quinine in addition.

Treatment of Burns.

In a serious burn as soon as the fire is extinguished the clothes must be removed. If not already thoroughly wet, the injured part should be drenched with water and the clothes cut away. Everything must be sacrificed to getting them off without pulling, as the slightest dragging brings the skin too. If patches of clothing adhere and will not drop off, they must be allowed to remain. Dip cloths in a thick solution of common baking soda in water, and lay them over the burnt surface, bandaging them over lightly to keep its place. As soon as a dry spot appears on this dressing, wet it with the soda and water by squeezing some on it. There will be no smarting while it is saturated and excludes the air. If a rubber sheet is not at hand, a piece of oilcloth, a gossamer cloak or any waterproof article can be spread on the bed with a blanket over it to receive the sufferer. If the feet are cold, heat should be applied to them. The bed covering should be warm and light. A doctor should be sent for as soon as possible. A deep burn is much less serious than a superficial one twice the size. Pain is a good sign in severe burns. It shows that there is still vitality to suffer.

Scalds can be treated in the same way. In slight cases, painting the surface with thick mucilage will sometimes give relief, or pouring oil over it and then covering it with a coating of flour. Anything that effectually excludes the air will relieve the pain. Persons suffering from these accidents should have concentrated nourishment. The doctor will prescribe opiates as needed. It is not safe for an unprofessional person to meddle with them.—Woman's Work.

The Good Man.

He was the most pleasant man you ever saw. There was sunshine in his smile, and his smile was for everybody. Just down there, at the next corner, an old man was wrestling with a heavy burden which was to much for him. Our pleasant friend approached him eagerly and relieved the old man of his load, carrying it on his own strong shoulders. Surely the angels in heaven do not fail to chronicle a deed like that, and they must hear the words of gratitude poured upon the noble man by the one he assisted. And now our smiling friend pats a youngster on the head and gives him a stick of candy, telling him to be good and go to Sabbath School regularly, so that when he dies he will be able to drop a nickel in the slot and get a crown. The boy's heart is brimming over with joy, and when he goes home he tells his father all about the gentleman who was so kind to him. This magnificent man grasps the toil-hardened hand of the laborer, and breathes words of encouragement. He goes down into the squalor and gloom of the alleys, carrying sunshine and gladness there. He is trying to improve the condition of his fellow-man, and to make the world more popular as a place in which to make your permanent residence. Who is he? A missionary? A philanthrophist? Not exactly; he is a candidate, and he is about as prevalent in this part of the country just now as weeds on a Missouri farm.—Nebraska State Journal.

Tendency to Increased Luxury.

The tendency of the time is to increased luxury. There will be more pretty little adjuncts to the dressing case this year than ever. Toilet sets have been growing richer and richer every year. Last year ivory backs to brushes, and ivory combs were considered the proper things. This year everything runs to oxidized silver for combs and brush and mirror backs. I suppose after awhile gold will be the proper caper.—J. A. W Fernow in Globe-Democrat.

The apparent object of the old systems of scholastic training was to produce scholars. The object of education in the modern sense is to produce capable citizens.

There is such a thing as being too good. A woman in Maine got a divorce from her husband because he went to temperance meetings six days during the week and on Sunday went to church twice.

Mrs. C. F. James, a lineal descendant of Martha Washington and daughter-in-law of ex-Postmaster-General James, will, it is said, shortly make her debut in a New York theater.

The discovery and utilization of natural gas have proved a powerful stimulus to the manufacture of iron pipes and tubes in this country; there are now 2,300 miles of mains in the United States for conveying natural gas.

Sydney Sprague, a farmer living near Wapakota, O., placed $475 in a stove for safe-keeping. Someone built a fire in the stove while he was away from home, and the next money he gets he will put in the savings bank.

A St. Louis hair-dresser says that bald-headed women are far more numerous than people suspect, and that the tendency to lose their hair is more marked among society women than among shop girls and working women.

"You'd be surprised," says a New York safe manufacturer, "at the number of sham pasteboard safes in New York, and they're made so well that any ordinary person would be deceived. They have a business-like appearance and give an office a thrifty look, all for $5 or $6, whereas the real article would cost something like $100.

The specific charges on which the German doctors will sue Sir Morrill Mackenzie, are first, the assertions as to the hopeless incompetence of the German faculty; second, the assumption that Dr. Gerhardt's treatment brought on cancer; and third, that Prof. Von Bergmann killed the emperor by poking a canula down a false passage in his throat.

The average watch is composed of 175 different pieces, comprising upward of 2,400 separate and distinct operations in its manufacture. The balance has 18.000 beats or vibrations per hour, 12,960,080 in thirty days, 157,680,000 in one year; it travels 1 43-100 inches with each vibration, which is equal to 9¾ miles in twenty-four hours, 29¼ miles in thirty days, or 3,558¾ miles in one year.

The London Times is in danger of losing, besides a great deal of money, the character it has built up during the present century. That the Parnell letters were forgeries there is now no doubt. The only question remaining to be decided is whether or not the Times, when it printed them, knew that they were forgeries. If it did of course it has been guilty of a piece of business that will disgrace it in the eyes of the English people.

A Beaver Falls (Pa.) man applied a match to the bunghole to see if the inside of a benzine barrel was clean, and a terrific explosion followed. The heavy oaken head of the barrel was blown through a cellar door, the lights in the house extinguished, the window glass smashed, some of the furniture broken, and the man's wife and children, who stood around watching his operations, were thrown to the floor, but escaped with a few bruises. The husband was not injured.

Seth Allen, aged 11, of Columbia Falls, Me., is a likely lad and will make his way in the world. When he was 8 years old he picked blueberries enough to buy a pair of steer calves in the fall. He broke them that winter, and the following winter hauled laths from the mills and thus earned enough to pay for wintering them. Last winter he hauled wood with them and did other jobs enough to pay for their keeping, and now has a well grown yoke of cattle worth $75, which he proposes to sell. He will then raise another pair of calves.

What is probably the tallest smoke chimney in the world can be seen from the windows of all the trains that cross the Newark meadows. It is being erected in East Newark. Its diameter at the base is twenty-eight feet. It is solid brick to an altitude of 310 feet. At its top it is nine feet in diameter. A cast-iron rim, twenty feet in diameter, and a bell surmount the whole, and make the total altitude of the structure 335 feet. One million seven hundred thousand bricks were used in its construction, and it cost $85,000.

THE NEWS RESUME.

Washington Happenings.

An investigation begun by the police of Washington into the career of a man traveling under name of Marion D. Newman has brought to light some very interesting things. Newman was arrested on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, brought by a woman whom he had met as the result of an advertisement stating that a gentleman desired the acquaintance of an intelligent lady with a view to matrimony. The woman who made the charge, after an interview with Newman, refused to press it, but the police found that he was ordained as a Methodist minister in Maine about a dozen years ago, and that subsequently he was transferred to New Jersey. It has also been ascertained that under the names of De-Hughes, Noble and St. Clair he has been married to women in Philadelphia, Jackson, Tenn., Indianapolis and Wisconsin.

The Washington Evening Post prints the following: One day Miss West, the daughter of the late English minister, was in a store on the avenue, and with her was a well known member of the Italian legation. While they were talking over a purchase, Mrs. Cleveland's carriage drove up to the curb, and she came in. She spoke to the gentleman, and for a moment talked with him, and then stepped toward Miss West and extended her hand in greeting. But the young lady would none of it. She had not quite forgotten how Mrs. Cleveland's husband had snubbed her father, and with a haughty grace she joined her hands in front of her and turned her back on the president's wife. It was embarassing, very embarassing, not only to the two parties at interest, but also to the gentleman, and Mrs. Cleveland relieved it by transacting her business and going without the usual parting salutations.

The Casualty Calendar.

Frederick Knorr, his wife and eleven-year-old daughter Anna perished in their burning dwelling at Vernon Center New York. Several attempts to enter the house and rescue the inmates were futile. The charred remains of the three were found in the cellar, the limbs being nearly burned off.

A man who gave his name as George Johnson, was found on the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad track at Chicago. Both legs were cut off below the knee, and the left arm to the shoulder was missing. It could not be learned which engine injured the man. He cannot possibly recover. He said his wife lived in Peoria.

Considerable damage was done by the snow storm which raged on Nov. 9th and 10th, in Missouri and Kansas. The storm was accompanied by a high wind, which prostrated telegraph wires in Missouri, Kansas and Colorado. Railroad travel is also impeded on most of the roads centering in Kansas City and other points.

There was an explosion of fire-damp in the coal mines owned by W. H. Brown & Sons, near Boston, Penn., in which four miners named Joseph Muse, William King, Peter Lord and a German, whose name could not be learned, were severely burned. They were setting out on the main entry when the roof of and old room near by fell in, driving the damp out, and coming in contact with the lamps it exploded.

The Cunard steamship Umria, which sailed from New York for Liverpool on the 10th, ran into and carried away the stern of the Fabre line freight steamer Iberia off Long Beach. The Umbria's collision bulk-head was partially crushed in above the water line. The Iberia was run ashore and her crew of thirty men were taken abroad and the Umbria, though her injuries are not serious, was brought back to her dock.

The most phenominal snow storm that ever occured in Kansas began Friday Nov. 9, and continued furiously for two days. The trains are all delayed and the telegraph wires are prostrated in all directions with the exception of one line to Kansas City. In Atchison over 100 telephone lines are so broken and tangled up with electric light wires that the electric works have been suspended to prevent accidents.

Talk About People.

Morrison Renshaw, the manager of George Castleman's campaign in the Tenth congressional district at St. Louis, and Charles D. Brockman, a saloonkeeper, have gone crazy in consequence of the election. Renshaw was formerly a newspaper reporter, and is a well known man about town. The doctor say he may recover. Brockman's case is more serious and he was sent to the insane asylum.

Petty Criminalities.

J. C. Howard was arrested at Helena, M. T., on charge of being concerned in numerous burglaries last spring. He was traced by stolen wearing apparel which he had sold to innocent parties.

During a political quarrel at Lima, Ohio, Richard McGrievy was stabbed three times in the groin by Nicholas Nicholas. McGrievy is still living, but his wounds are believed to be fatal. Nicholas has been arrested.

H. Walden was arrested at Henderson, Ky., for obtaining money under false pretenses. He was the agent of a firm of book publishers, and on the strength of large lists of forged subscriptions the firm advanced him quite a sum of money, upon the receipt of which he skipped out.

Sarah B. Farrar, of Keene, N. H., aged nineteen, a student in the freshman class of Smith college, Northampton, Mass., jumped from the Massachusetts Central railroad bridge into the Connecticut river, a distance of sixty feet, and was drowned. Her father died recently, and it is supposed that melancholy had unsettled her mind.

W. A. Schumacker, postmaster at Corbonhill Alabama, was shot and instantly killed by his wife, who was only 17 years old, and to whom he had been married only a short time. Schumacker had been drinking heavily since the election. He attacked his wife and threatened to burn her to death in oil. She disarmed him once and when he attacked her a second time she drew a pistol and shot him through the heart. She then attempted to shoot herself, but was prevented. Schumacker was one of the most prominent citizens of Walker county. Mrs. Schumacker has been arrested.

An attempt was made to burglarize the safe in the Bank of Cumberland, Wis., but as the outer vault door was locked and the combination broken, it was supposed to be a failure. An expert from St. Paul opened the vault. The inner vault doors, together with the safe and burglar-proof chest, were blown to shapeless fragments. A large sum of money was exposed, but fortunately only $265 in coins and some other valuables were taken, the last explosion having ruined the outer vault lock and prevented entrance. The loss is about $1,400. No clue to the perpetrators, though they are known to be professionals.

Gov. Leslie of Montana issued papers asking the secretary of state to make a requisition upon the Canadian government for the person of George Godas, now under arrest at Edmonton, Northwest Territory. Godas is a half-breed Cree Indian, who escaped from the Helena jail last August while under conviction, and awaiting sentence for the murder of a farmer named Embody last winter. He was pursued after his escape was discovered, but eluded the officers and crossed into Northwest territory, where he was arrested a few days ago by mounted police. Godas was convicted on circumstantial evidence, and when he escaped the court was considering a motion for a new trial.

A shooting affair occurred four miles west of Big Stone City, Dakota, by which Richard McNab lost his life. C. W. Shatto, who fired the fatal shot, gives the following account: He owns land adjoining the farm of Mrs. Waite, whose husband is employed on the Northern Pacific railroad. Mrs. Waite was in need of a man to take care of stock and do outside work on the farm. Mr. Shatto took a man for the position to the Waite farm. After the party had had supper, Shatto asked Richard McNab, a man who had been for a short time in the position of farm laborer, to hitch up his horse. He replied that he didn't have to, whereupon Shatto told him it was all right, he would do it himself. McNab went out of the house. In a few minutes Shatto started for the barn, and, as he stepped out of the door, a shot fired by McNab within six feet of him just missed him. Shatto remembered having seen a revolver on a shelf in the house, and retiring to the house, put it in his pocket. As he emerged from the door the second time McNab commanded him to hold up his hands. Shatto complied, and asked him why he wanted to shoot him, to which he made no reply but fired at him. Shatto then fired and killed McNab.

Miles A. French and his wife Nellie were arrested at Bridgeport, Conn., by Pinkerton detectives as they were about taking a train for Boston. French has been employed the last three years by the Bridgeport Copper company, his business being to extract silver from copper ore. For some time past he has been carrying on a system of stealing the silver thus obtained. The company had no means of knowing the exact amount of silver taken from each ton of ore, which French well knew, and they trusted to his honesty. When a ton of ore would exceed the average he would appropriate the excess to his own use. He soon began to spend money freely and lived far beyond his salary, which caused the firm to investigate matters. This resulted in his arrest. He or his wife, or both, made frequent trips to Boston, Providence and New York, where they met agents and disposed of their plunder. When arrested they had about $1,200 worth of silver in bars. It is thought that French has stolen from $10,000 to $15,000 in this manner.

A powerful American syndicate is about to be formed for the purpose of building railroads in Siberia. Besides a large subsidy the government will give 4,000,000 roubles yearly for the transportation of mails and convicts.

The inquest in the case of James Dunne, an aged tenant, who died in the roadway after being evicted from his home at Ardee, Ireland, has resulted in a verdict of murder. The coroner has issued a warrant for the arrest of Dudgeon and Emerson, solicitors.

A vessel which has arrived at a port in Norway reports that Nansen, the explorer, has accomplished his perilous journey across Greenland on the inland ice, and has arrived safely at Godthaab, on the west coast of Greenland. The journey was made on snow-shoes, and was for the purpose of exploring the unknown interior of Greenland.

The Italian explorer Nerazzini is on the eve of leaving Rome for Abyssinia for the purpose of treating with King Teklaimanot, who recently defeated the Abyssinian general, Ras Aloula. The explorer Antonelli is charged by the government with a similar mission to King Menelik. This action on the part of the government has induced the belief that Italy's intention is to profit by the quarrels between the various petty Abyssinian kings to the end of overthrowing King John and obtaining possession of a lion's share of the territory in the division which would follow.

The Winnipeg Sun, the government organ, says: Jim Hill wired the Premier Greenway saying the Pioneer Press had reported him as saying that he had offered as much as $23,000 to carry the elections in Manitoba in return for certain railway legislation. He indignantly denied it and wanted a retraction. Mr. Greenway wired him that if such a report was telegraphed it was incorrect; that he was having his speech printed verbatim, and would send him a copy in due time. What Mr. Greenway said in his speech was that J. B. McArthur had come to him and said that Mr. Hill would supply as much as $20,000 in order to assist him in carrying the elections.

The blockade of the East African coast will extend from Cape Guardafui or Massowah to Madagascar. The German squadron will be increased by three vessels. It is possible that Prince Henry will command the fleet. It is now stated that the plantation company will enlist men in the Dutch East Indies. It is thought the government contemplates a similar plan in case the blockade is not sufficient. The blockade, which has been sanctioned by the sultan, has been deferred for a week at the request of the British consul in order to give time for the withdrawal of the English mission at Mazilia.

Lord Sackville is said to be hesitating whether or not to attend the Endicott-Chamberlain wedding. Personally he desires to go, as it was at the legation ball given in January last that Mr. Chamberlain was introduced to his bride-elect. Officially Lord Sackville feels that his position in this country is an anomalous one, and even for the purpose of tendering his congratulations upon the auspicious event as one of her majesty's subjects he cannot yet determine which would be the more dignified course to go or to stay at home.

The anarchists of New York held a meeting at Cooper union to commemorate the hanging of their five brothers at Chicago a year ago. There were red banners and red streamers on all sides of the hall, but there were no stars or stripes. William Mortens presided, and, after a few words in praise of the hanged anarchists and many words in condemnation of policemen, judges and good government in general, introduced S. E. Schevitch, who alluded to the Statue of Liberty as a prostitute figure. When he spoke of the bomb which had been thrown among the policemen in Chicago, the crowd went wild with delight. Crazy Johan Most followed him and worked himself up into the wildest excitement. Anarchists, he said, believed neither in god nor the devil.

Gladstone's Movements.

Mr. Gladstone was driven from Birmingham to Wolverhampton in a carriage drawn by four horses. He was cheered enthusiastically along the route. When he arrived at Wolverhampton he received the addresses presented to him in the drill hall. Here the uproar was so great that he was compelled to abruptly close his reply to the addresses. The door by which Mr. Gladstone emerged was guarded by the stewards, who kept the crowd from surrounding the ex-premier. Mr. Gladstone then took the train for Oxford. At Snow Hill the crowd at the station hooted him. At Leamington the ex-mayor welcomed him, while the ex-mayor's wife presented Mrs. Gladstone with a bouquet. The liberal leader was similarly welcomed at Banbury. When the party arrived at Oxford, a crowd, composed mainly of undergraduates, hooted Mr. Gladstone as he drove to the residence of Warden Keeble. Mr. Gladstone was the guest of Warden Talbott, of Keeble college, Oxford, on Sunday the 11th. He attended early service in the college chapel and morning prayer in St. Mary's church, and in the afternoon was present at the cathedral with Mrs. Gladstone. The Economist contests Mr. Gladstone's statement that home rule is so rooted in the minds of the people that it will survive his leadership with undiminished vigor. "After the death of Mr. Gladstone," it says, "home rule will have to stand on its own merits. Mr. Gladstone's present colleagues being all inferior, nobody is able to predict who his successor will be. His equals have all abandoned him."

Keely and his Motor.

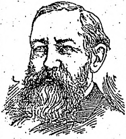
The court of common pleas at Philadelphia made the rule to issue an attachment against John W. Keely for contempt of court in not obeying the order of the court absolute. It also discharged the rule to dissolve the injunction as well as the rule to open the sealed package which is in the hands of the court, and which is said to contain a description of the Keely motor. It also continued the injunction against Keely until further notice. The suit in which Inventor Keely is thus brought to grief is the one instituted in equity by Bennet C. Wilson, in which experts were appointed by the court to examine the construction of Keely's mechanical apparatus with the view of determining whether it corresponded or was indentical with a certain motor device which Keely assigned to Wilson in 1869. A committee of experts was appointed to inspect the Keely motor, and an argument took place upon application of Mr. Wilson's counsel for an attachment upon Keely for contempt of the order of April 7, last in refusing to divulge information which the experts claimed they needed. The discussion waxed hot upon the justness of the majority report of the experts, in which they came to the conclusion that they were unable to understand the apparatus known as the "Keely motor," nor could they obtain a proper and intelligent explanation of its working and construction. Under the attachment issued for Inventor Keely, he can be taken at any time and committed to the county jail pending the pleasure of the court.

A NOVEMBER BATTLE

Harrison and Morton Elected, Carrying All the Northern States But Connecticut and New Jersey.

Republicans Made a Clean Sweep All Over the Country, Including the Next Congress.

It took two days before it could be stated that Harrison and Morton are elected beyond the possibility of a doubt or the reach of a peradventure. New York has voted for the Republican ticket by a majority of which the lowest reliable estimates are 10,000, and which will undoubtly exceed that figure. This is not the claim of an enthusiastic Republican, or the estimate of a party committee in the business of claiming everything. It is the voice of an actual count of ballots which nothing can set aside. It is conceded by leading Democrats, and by all the reliable Democratic press of New York city and state. There is no question about any state not hitherto considered doubtful unless it be California, from which we need not expect complete returns for some days to come. But, though everybody believes that it will add its votes to the Republican column, it would make not the slightest difference were it to chance to go for Cleveland. Enough states are absolutely counted for the Republian ticket, including New York, to give a handsome majority of the electoral college.



THE NEW PRESIDENT.

THE GENERAL RESULT.

The vote in the electoral college will stand as follows:

Harrison—		Cleveland—
California	8	Alabama	10
Colorado	3	Arkansas	7
Illinois	22	Connecticut	6
Indiana	15	Delaware	3
Iowa	13	Florida	4
Kansas	9	Georgia	12

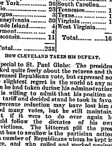
HOW CLEVELAND TAKES HIS DEFEAT.

Special to St. Paul Globe: The president talked quite freely about the returns and the increased Republican vote, but expressed not the slightest regret in the world at any action he had taken during his administration. He is willing to admit that his position on the tariff and decided stand he took in favor of revenue reduction may have lost him a good many votes, but he still maintains that if it were to do over again he would follow the dictates of his own convictions. The bitterest pill the president has to swallow is the partisian action of a number of Republicans whom he kept in office, and who railed and worked against him with all their power. Their deportment towards the administration is a source of great disappointment to him. The president received no telegrams from New York city later than early in the afternoon. From what he has heard, however, he concedes his defeat. No man ever took defeat more philosophically. He lays his defeat to no one. Hill and Tammany hall, he says, treated him perfecely square, and he has no fault to find against them at all.



THE NEW VICE-PRESIDENT.

WHAT THE OLD ROMAN SAYS:

Judge Thurman said at Columbus that so far as he himself was concerned he cared nothing for defeat. He much regretted the defeat of the party, however, because he foresaw the mischief the Republican party might do. Already he saw intimations in the Republican press of a return of the carpet bagging system in the South, and he feared the party if it obtained complete control of congress would seek to insure its continuance in power by admitting Dakota, Idaho and Montana.

COMMENT AT WASHINGTON.

The calm which has hung over Washington during the last days of the canvass has not been greatly disturbed and it is doubtful if any city in the Union, received the election news with less apparent agitation. Of course the larger proportion of persons interested here are Democrats, but even they did not show great signs of grief over Cleveland's defeat. There have been fair sized crowds around the bulletin boards all day, but they have had little to say, even the Republicans showing mild enthusiasm over the returns. At the White House it was impossible to get even an expression of opinion on the result. Mr. Cleveland took his apparent defeat with great nerve and was as imperturbable at the usual room reception as ever. He looked comfortable and chatted pleasantly with a few friends. Col. Lamont received dispatches all day from New York, many of them from Brice and Barnum of the usual misleading hope-on-hope-ever character, but they evidently did not fool Dan, who, when asked, stated briefly but regularly that they had heard nothing favorable. The most pitiable part of the whole matter is the lack of interest taken in Mr. Cleveland's defeat. It does not seem as if there were fifty people who honestly regret Mr. Cleveland's failure. He seems entirely without warm, personal friends. One of the most notable features of this election is the failure on the part of the Democrats here to attempt to explain it away with the usual methods. They seem to take their defeat as the natural result of the failure of their president to understand the interests of his own country. But few cabinet officers are in town.

REPUBLICAN GAINS IN CONGRESS.

It will hardly take the official count to determine the political complexion of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress. The Republicans made a surprising sweep of the city of St. Louis, and carried three Democratic districts. They have carried, apparently, three close districts in Michigan, now represented by Democrats, and have captured the districts of Weaver and Anderson, Dem., in Iowa. John Baker, Rep., is beaten in Morrison's district. The Republicans have carried the Cleveland district in Ohio and three Minnesota districts now represented by Democrats. One Republican congressman has been gained in Tennessee. The Democrats have gained two or three districts in Virginia. There are enough doubtful districts unreported in various states to decrease the Republican majority three or four. The New York delegation is unchanged. The Republicans elect Stivers over Bacon in the Orange district, and the Democrats Wiley over Crowley in the Niagara district.

NEW YORK STATE.

The scattering and revised returns from New York state all favor Harrison. The most important revision to be made in the Sun's table is the shifting of Rensselaer county from the Democratic to the Republican side. Troy city gave great Democratic gains, but the country men who live without the Trojan walls kept up the Republican gains shown everywhere else throughout the rural districts. Mr. Harrison's plurality in New York state is about 12,000. All the New York papers concede the state to him and the people who bet their money on Cleveland are beginning to settle. The Albany Argus, (Dem.) the state paper, gives Harrison a majority of 10.000 over Cleveland.

INDIANA GONE REPUBLICAN.

Indiana is now conceded to Harrison by a plurality of from 5,000 to 7,000. The Republicans are satisfied that the state has been carried beyond any possibility of doubt. This gains reported in nearly every precinct are maintained throughout the day. Reports from 780 precincts give a Republican majority of 5,812, which is an average gain of 8 to the precinct. This will give Harrison a gain of 13,250 over 1884 and a majority of 6,700. Reports are alike from Republican and Democratic districts and they report Republican gains everywhere that assure an even larger majority than was predicted, if they continue as now running. In the counties where losses were expected there have been gains, and Marion county has more discouragement than all the remainder of the state, so far as the national ticket is concerned.

MICHIGAN, ILLINOIS AND CONNECTICUT.

Every fresh return from Michigan shows a Republican gain, and the plurality for Harrison may reach 18,000. That Illinois has never been in doubt is attested by the fact that she gives 20,000 plurality for Harrison. Connecticut is surely Democratic. Revised and trustworthy figures from nearly every polling place show a plurality of 494.

THE RESULT IN OHIO.

The bulletin boards at the Ohio State Journal and Dispatch offices at Columbus were watched all day by crowds of people, who seemed to care little for the rain and mud, but stood anxiously awaiting the news, and discussing it when it was received. Probably the coolest and apparently the least interested man in the city was Judge Thurman, who spent his time in the same way he has done for the past few years, quietly reading in his library. He was free from opinions as to the result and had not been paying much attention to the particulars of the election. Being asked for an expression of his opinion, said he had nothing to say. The two state committees are still receiving returns from the state and are figuring up the gains and losses. The Republicans are claiming a plurality of from 25,000 to 30,000, and place their estimates on more or less complete returns from about half the counties in the state.

THE SOLID SOUTH DEMOCRATIC.

It is needless to announce that all the Southern states have stood by the democratic ticket, and to their number can be added New Jersey and Connecticut.

THE OTHER STATES AND TERRITORIES.

Pennsylvania goes Republican by 8,000 majority. The Republicans of North Carolina, have most certainly elected congressmen from the Second and Fifth districts. Returns indicate a large Democratic majority in the legislature, which elects a successor to Senator Ransom. The returns also indicate the election of eight Democratic congressmen and three Republicans.

West Virginia is close: Twenty-two counties, casting half the vote of the state show, Republican gains of 3,454. The same relative gain through the rest of the state would make it Republican by 700. This is from the chairman of the Republican state central committee. Atkinson (Rep.) elected over Pendleton (Dem.) in the First district 600 majority.

Dakota goes strongly Rebublican, by probably 30,000, while Montana, which was democratic, now sends a republican delegate to congress, by 4,000 majurity.

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

State.	Rep.	Dem.	State.	Rep.	Dem.
Alabama	0	8	Missouri	4	10
Arkansas	1	4	Nebraska	3	0
California	5	1	Nevada	1	0
Colorado	1	0	N. Hampshire	2	0
Connecticut	2	2	New Jersey	5	2
Delaware	0	1	New York	18	16
Florida	0	2	N. Carolina	3	6
Georgia	0	10	Ohio	16	5
Illinois	14	6	Oregon	1	0
Indiana	5	8	Pennsylv'nia	22	6
Iowa	9	2	Rhode Island	2	0
Kansas	7	0	S. Carolina	0	7
Kentucky	3	8	Tennessee	2	8
Louisiana	1	5	Texas	0	11
Maine	4	0	Vermont	2	0
Maryland	2	4	Virginia	4	6
Mass'ch'setts	10	2	W. Virginia	3	1
Michigan	9	2	Wisconsin	6	3
Minnesota	4	1
Mississippi	0	7	Total	171	154

MINNESOTA STRONGLY REPUBLICAN.

The Pioneer Press, of Thursday says: The ascertained or reported results of the vote on govenor in nearly every case considerably exceed the estimates by counties of Merriam's majorities published by the Pioneer Press on Tuesday, while the majorities for Wilson are in nearly every case less than estimated. The total result is that Merriam's majority in the state will exceed 20,000, which is 7,000 above our estimate. The echoes of Gilman's and Scheffer's eloquence may be distinctly heard reverberating through these returns.

One of the results of the campaign in this state is the assured election of five Republican congressmen. For there is no longer any doubt that in all the three districts which have been represented for the past two years by Democratic representatives in congress, three Republican candidates have been chosen.

COMMENT IN LONDON.

The London Times says: Though we believe that President Cleveland's internal policy and his administration are more remarkable for capacity and uprightness than anything to which the Rebublicans can point in recent years, we cannot profess regret at an event which may be regarded as an appropriate penalty for his discreditable subservience to the meanest influences of American politics and his culpable neglect of the decencies of international intercourse. It is not improbable that President Cleveland's hasty change of front in the fisheries affairs and Secretary Bayard's treatment of Lord Sackville alienated, or at least cooled the zeal of many friends of purity, reform and national dignity, whom the corrupt, demagogic rule of the Republicans had driven to the opposite camp. In respect to his fiscal policy, there is no reason why Mr. Harrison, if he has the courage to shake off the domination of the machine, may not emulate and even surpass President Cleveland. We are sincerely sorry that the change of government involves the retirement of Minister Phelps, who has performed his duties with marked ability and adroitness, and has won our esteem and friendship."

The Papers in the Sackville Case.

LONDON, Nov. 6.—The papers in the Sackville case were made public this evening. The first is a letter from Lord Salisbury to Lord Sackville, and is dated Oct. 27. It is as follows:

Mr. Phelps, who is staying at my house, informs me that Mr. Bayard's request for your recall is not based upon the letter to Murchison, but upon a newspaper interview. I replied that I was glad it was not true that the request was due to the writing of the letter, which was made public only by a betrayal of confidence, and it was hardly practicable to lay down the principle that a diplomatic representative should be prohibited from expressing, even privately, any opinion upon events passing in the country to which he is accredited. The language of an interview is different. You must be taken as having intended it for publication. Before admitting the need for a recall, I was bound in justice to you to know exactly what the objectional language was. I therefore asked Mr. Phelps for a copy of the interview in order to ascertain from you whether you had been accurately reported, and I told him that I would then bring the matter before my collegues. Mr. Phelps replied that he had not received the text of the interview, but would take steps to procure it. It was consequently understood that until the copy was received there should be no answer to the request for the recall.

On Oct. 28 Lord Sackville sent the following communication to Lord Salisbury:

The letter was a political Republican plot. I have mailed an explanation. The plot was due to the approaching election. If my recall is demanded, I beg to express deep regret at what has occurred.

On the 30th Lord Sackville cabled that he had received a passport. On the 31st Mr. Phelps informed Lord Salisbury that the United States government had given Lord Sackville a passport, and added that President Cleveland hoped that another minister would be sent to Washington. On the same day Lord Sackville sent the following dispatch to Lord Salisbury:

I beg to repudiate Mr. Bayard's statement of the reasons for my dismissal as an unjust attack on my integrity.

Lord Salisbury at once sent the following reply:

Place Mr. Herbert, as senior secretary on the spot, in charge of the legation.

On Nov. 1 Lord Salisbury, in a communication to Mr. Phelps, referred to his promise to furnish him with a copy of the Sackville interview and informed him that as he had no further information as to what Lord Sackville's statements contained, or to whom they were made, he was unable to form any judgement upon the considerations which dictated the request for the recall, or the forwarding of a passport. To this, on the next day, Mr. Phelps made reply as follows:

Our recollection of what passed in the conversation we had on Sunday differs slightly in one particular. It intended that the letter should have no part in the reasons for the request for the recall of Lord Sackville. I did say that the minister's remarks on the published interview were the principal reason. I am still without a copy of the interview. I have sent to Mr. Bayard a copy of your lordship's note requesting full details of the language and circumstances.

A letter written by Lord Sackville Oct. 20, was received by Lord Salisbury on the 4th inst. It encloses the Murchison letter and his reply to it. He says:

I have certain information that the Murchison letter was concerted by a well known firm in conjunction with the Republican committee in New York. It was sent from Southern California to prevent suspicion. Mr Bayard, whom I saw to-day, said he regretted the incident very much. He accepted my disclaimer of any thought or intention to interfere with the domestic policy of the country. He said it was a campaign trap, but he frankly told me that I had been indiscreet. I expressed my deep regret, and Mr. Bayard assured me he bore me no ill will.

The impression prevails in London that Lord Salisbury is reserving any intended reference to the Sackville incident for the ministerial banquet, which takes place at Guild Hall on Friday next. Thus far he has declined to make any statement regarding the matter for publication. He will then doubtless feel it necessary to say something about it, as what he feels and the course he intends to pursue concerning the incident is awaited with a good deal of interest. The official papers, which were published containing the correspondence between the dismissed minister and the premier afford conclusive evidence of what was suspected all along, that the muddle was largely due to the neglect of both sides to use the cable freely, and have a proper understanding immediately after the occurrence. It seems that a misunderstanding was the result of this neglect. The combined cable bill would not have exceeded £10.

Living Entirely on Meat.

Dr. T. W. Green, writing to an English journal from Montevideo, says that fresh meat forms the staple of diet in a part of the province of Buenos Ayers, where he lived for four years. Vegetables and fruit were unknown except for one month in the autumn, bread could not be had, and buscuits and farina, a meal made from mandicca, were too expensive for the poor. The population live entirely on meat, and drink nothing but the mate de yerba, a bitter kind of herb, containing the same active principle as tea and coffee. It is not uncommon for a man to eat four or five pounds of meat at a meal; but Dr. Green thinks it contains less fibrine and albumen, and more salts and water, than English meat. He never knew a case of scurvy, or anything like it, during the four years he practiced amongst the inhabitants.—Boston Budget.

Mr. Gladstone, replying to a deputation, which called on him at Birmingham, said that he considered it his duty not to retire from public as long as the Irish question remained unsettled.

Says He is a Son of Napoleon III.

A Herald cable special from Paris says: Prado, the alleged murderer of Marie Agaeton, the courtesan, whose assassination in the Rue de Rome caused such a sensation three years ago, is again to the fore. He was arrested last July, and a few days ago made a daring attempt to escape from prison. He constructed a rope ladder out of the sheets and concealed this under his clothing. He obtained permission to have an interview with his mistress in the bureau of one of the keepers, and it was from this room that he expected to let himself down to a neighboring roof and so gain his freedom. His only mistake was in making a poor choice in his female confederate, for it appears that the woman instead of aiding her former lover cooly handed over his letter of explanation to the police, who promptly put an end to the scheme. In an examination which followed Prado declared, in reply to a question of his identity that he was an illegitimate son of the Emperor Napoleon III, his mother having been one of the empress' maids of honor. That startling statement is not entirely discredited, and will doubtless lead to an investigation. Prado is quick and intelligent, and is studying up his defense. He has lawyers but says: "I depend upon myself. My defense is that I am a thief, but a murder, no!"

A Sovereign.

A young man with the breezy air and the pure fresh odors of lawn and hillside about his vernal figure, came to town recently, and growing weary about noon, chased a vagrant circus van three-quarters of a mile before he caught it, and then the door was locked and he couldn't go in. He braced up, turned the badge of his marching club out where all men might see it, and said that the proud and haughty, the pampered darlings of fortune, the princes and kings, and the mighty ones of earth might ride in street cars if they wished it, but for him, he was free-born, and would walk the earth erect as one who trod his own domain and paid tribute to no man, ha, ha! And so saying, he wrapped the drapery of the sidewalk about him and lay down to dreamless dreams.—Burdette.

He Had Both Pride and Taste.

rom the Albany Journal.

An amiable young female pedagogue residing in the Mohawk Valley prides herself on the close relations of trust and confidence which exist between her and the many little ones in the primary department. One day a little fellow made his way to the teacher's desk and, with many blushes and much embarrassment, finally managed to say: "You, don't care, do you, Miss——, if my pants don't match my coat?"

AFTER THE BATTLE,

Harrison's Election Conceded—Some Fragments of News Condensed from Multitudinous Newspaper Reports.

PEOPLE WILD IN INDIANA.

Probably no city in the Union ever witnessed such extraordinary and outlandish scenes of enthusiasm, chaotic but good natured disorder as prevailed at Indianapolis after Harrison's election was assured. Certainly the citizens of Indianapolis never before saw such a sight. The demonstrations that occured immediately following the news of Gen Harrison's nomination sank into insignificance as compared with the scenes of Thursday. Throughout the day, whenever the rain ceased falling, the distant boom of the cannon echoed the enthusiasm of the 10,000 celebrating Republicans, and the streets were swarming with yelling, hooting, horn-blowing thousands marching back and forth utterly regardless of the mud and water.

THE EFFECT IN WASHINGTON.

Gen. Harrison's election having been conceded by Chairman Brice Washington people breathe freer and will probably dare now to send a few telegrams of congratulations to the president elect. There are a few confident citizens however, who have believed for as much as twenty-four hours that the Republicans had been elected and these persons have already begun the process of cabinet making. Rumor, which frequently during the campaign charged Mr. Blaine with an ambition to assume Mr. Bayard's place, and become premier of the new administration, has suddenly changed its tone and asserts that Mr. Blaine does not want the place, but if he aspires to any place, would go as minister to England. Rumor places Mr. Sherman as a possible candidate for the position of secretary of state, his experience as chairman of the senate foreign relations committee having given him special fitness for the place. It seems to be assured that ex-Gov. Russell A. Alger of Michigan will be made secretary of war. Rumor also makes John C. New secretary of the treasury, and Wanamaker of Philadelphia is talked of for postmaster general. Warner Miller, Goff of Virginia and Phelps of New Jersey are all talked of for cabinet positions.

CHEERFULNESS OF THE OLD ROMAN.

Judge Thurman on Wednesday was found him in one of his happiest moods.

"I am the most cheerful defeated candidate that ever ran for an office, and personally do not care a straw. I regret the defeat of my party, however, as I believed that its success would be beneficial to the country."

"You then concede the election of Harrison and Morton?"

"Certainly, they are elected, if there is any dependence to be placed upon the returns. I have heard no information beyond that which has been published, and of course can give no news."

"You are undoubtedly surprised at the result in New York?"

"Yes; I do not disguise the fact that I am. I believed that Mr. Cleveland would carry the state. The manufactures who did not want to be touched, however, made a supreme effort, and, together with other things connected with the campaign, worked against Mr. Cleveland. The fight for Mayor undoubtedly damaged Mr. Cleveland, and he was probably traded off to a considerable extent, yet how much I am unable to say."

Allen W. Thurman, the son, expressed the opinion that the principal cause of the defeat of the president was the opposition brought to bear by the Grand Army of the Republic.

SCATTERING NOTES.

The Michigan congressional delegation will stand 8 Republican and 3 democrats, a Republican gain of three.

Iowa will give Harrison a plurality of nearly 110,000.

Hon. S. S. Cox of New York despondingly said: I think the house is against us, notwithstanding our gains in Virginia and other states. The Northwest and West, including Minnesota, Michigan and Wisconsin, have failed to respond for us.

The Democrats have carried Arkansas safely, but there is likely to be a contest in the First and Second congressional districts.

The latest returns from New Jersey indicate that the Democrats will have a majority of five on the joint ballot in the next legislature.

Florida has gone Democratic by over 13,-900 majority, and elects both Democratic congressmen.

A private dispatch from A. R. S. Richardson of San Francisco, received in Washington, says that Harrison will have a plurality in California of about 3,000. The dispatch also states that the Republicans have apparently carried the Third, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth congressional districts.

The Republican state central committee estimate Harrison's plurality in Illinois at 25,000. The Democratic committee rooms were closed, and no figures from that source could be obtained. Except in the Baker-Forman district, the congressmen from Illinois, there is no doubt, will be as first reported. The Republican central committee reports that complete returns from ninety counties in Illinois and careful estimates on the remaining twelve gives Fifer for governor, 13,007 plurality.

A story is in circulation in Covington, Ky., that speaker Carlisle is to be deprived of his certificate of election on the ground of alleged illegality of ballots cast for him in Campbell and Kenyon counties. It is assumed that if these are thrown out his majority in the district will be overcome. The Kentucky law, it is said, requires that the ballot shall be on plain white paper with no distinguishing feature, but the Caralisle ballots were printed on large sheets of perforated paper, so that when the ticket were torn apart perforations appeared on the edges and made them easily distinguishable from other tickets. Color is given to the story by the fact that the canvassing board in Campbell county is Republican.

Dispatches just received from the capital of West Virginia announce that the Democratic state treasurer, Thompson, concedes the state to the Republicans by from four to seven hundred majority. This is simply a confirmation of steady Republican gains that have been coming in. The Republican state committee here claim the state by a much larger majority. They claim to have at least three, and probably a solid delegation of four congressmen. They claim majorities for the electorial ticket, and a majority in the legislature. The scene of Republican enthusiasm in Wheeling was unprecedented. Thousands of people have crowded the streets.

Secretary Bayard's humiliation is rendered complete by the action of the people in Kent and Sussex counties in Delaware. They have elected a Republican legislature and the infamous tax collection will now be repealed, and a Republican United States senator will be chosen to succeed Saulsbury (Dem.).

Wisconsin gives Harrison over twenty thousand majority.

Dakota continues to poll up a Republican majority.

Merriam's majority in Minnesota is counting up towards 25,000.

The Republicans in Minnesota returned to their first love and carried everything before them including a majority of ninety in the legislature.

There seems to be no doubt that the Republicans have carried the lower house of congress.

The Utah Mormons who settled in the Canadian Northwest two years ago are beginning to show their strength. A large deputation from Lee's Creek arrived at Ottawa to inteview the minister of the interior. Hitherto they have been homesteading, but now they want to secure a town site. One of the elders, a son of the late Prophet Smith, says the work of proselyting will be undertaken in this country and Europe. Asked if they proposed to practice polygamy, they replied evasively to the effect that they would not break the laws of the country. It is difficult to say what action the government will pursue with regard to the Mormons, now that they have obtained a foothold on British soil. It is feared here that emigration of Mormons from Utah to the Canadian Northwest will soon assume vast proportions.

A political quarrel at Livingston, Ky., resulted in the killing of five men. The fighting was started by Champion Mullins and John Martin, who commenced shooting at each other. The friends of each joined in the shooting, which was kept up for fifteen minutes. It was then found that the following named persons had been killed: Samuel Ward, member of the Kentucky legislature; John Califord, an agent of the Louisville & Nashville railroad; John Martin, government stock operater; Frank Stewart, a Kentucky Central railroad employe; Champion Mullins. J. Sambrook, a merchant, was badly wounded and may die.

Mrs. Jay Gould is dangerously sick, and her physicians are unable to encourage hope of her recovery. She suffered a stroke of paralysis on Nov. 6th, however, and since that time her condition has been regarded as desperate.

Carrying Out the Teacher

"He don't know a hawk from a hand-saw!" said Jad Day. "If he did, he wouldn't come here."

"But we,ll teach him so't he'll know afore we git through with him. He'll git the consate taken out of him," laughed Jote Yates.

"Won't he, though!" chorused Ziby Swain, "Cuffy" Wyman and Nat Durfee.

These were some of the Kaidger boys. They were lounging about the schoolhouse waiting for the new master to come. The winter's school was to begin that morning.

"Oh, you think yer smart,,' reported Sally Briggs. "Talk about consate! He may take the consate out of you. It'll be a pity if he don't."

"Who's that just spoke up and said nothing!" sneered Jote, looking around with more seriousness.

The others laughed and Sally was silent, but she determined not to forget the insult.

"They say he wears store cloes," said Ziby. 'I'spose he thinks we never saw any here. Won't he feel highly honored though, when he hears us all salute him when he comes in?"

"Here he comes, fellers, just 'round the turn out by the alders thar'," cried Nat. 'Be ready now to yell when he comes in. Bray and whinny just your prettiest soon's he shows his head in the door."

The boys at "Kaidger Hill," were a rough set, as the reader has already seen. They had the reputation of being the worst in the country; at least the town of Gainsboro, where the Kaidger Hill school district was located. Since the town was first settled there had been trouble in school here nearly every winter.

It is not wholly the fault of the boys. The parents were constantly quarrelling, one family with another. The year before the story opens there had been loud contention concerning the school house, the old one having mysteriously taken fire and burned. Some of the townspeople wished to build a new one, but the majority thought it best to occupy for school purposes a recently erected log house, which a young settler had built, intending to make his home in the district, but who suddenly changed his mind and departed for another State.

It happened, therefore, that after much wrangling the log house was taken for a school-house. It was a strong structure, 24 by 20 feet on the ground. At a distance of twenty-five feet from the house was a low but strong log cow barn, 15 by 12, with a roof of large "splits" covered with turf.

The house had a front door and four windows, also an end door opening into a covered way or portico, connecting the cow-barn.

But few alterations were made; the cow-barn with its connecting covered walk being used as a wood-house. As I have said, there was a door opening out of the school room into the covered walk, and there was also another door where this walk connected with the wood house.

The other outside door of the former cow-barn was nailed up, so that the only way into the present wood house was from the school room. The doors were each provided with strong iron "hasps" and staples, as is common in such pioneer structure. From this rather peculiar arrangement of the wood house it bore among the boys the nickname of the "trap."

I have frequently noticed that where the parents in a school district are at variance, that district is noted for ill behavior and rebellion in the school room. The Kaidger Hill district was an extreme illustration of the truth of this statement.

Jad Day, Cuffy Wyman, Jote Yates, Nat Durfee and Ziby Swan were rough youngsters from 17 to 19 years old, not lacking in bone or brawn, boastful of their powers at rough and tumble, and correspondingly deficient in intellectual gifts.

Jad was a thick-set, round headed boy, with the little twinkling eyes of an arrant rogue, while Joe was a more thin specimen of aggressiveness, nearly six feet tall. Nat, Ziby and Cuffy Wyman, were less peculiar in appearance but not a whit behind in the aptitude for making trouble at school.

For the last three years there had not been a complete winter term of school in the district. Four "masters" had been "carried out" by the boys, and they declared they would carry out every master that the agent could hire to come there.

Their mode of doing the "carrying out" was commonly to rush upon the unfortunate pedagogue and carry him out of doors, willy-nilly, and throw him into a snow drift, or else to put him into the "trap" and keep him there during the rest of the day.

Usually the luckless victim was glad to depart—as soon as he could—from the school house and the district. One, however—a young theological student—mustering courage to return to his post the next morning, after being carried out, was taken to the top of the long hill which had given the district its name, and lashed fast to a handsled and set going Mazeppa like out of the district.

The young rascals left him the free use of his feet to steer with, a favor the unfortunate man was, no doubt truly grateful for before he reached the bottom of the hill, after a wild ride of nearly a mile. He did not return even for his hat, which flew off his head midway of the hill.

A still more atrocious trick was played on the next master, an itinerant minister of the Methodist church, who had been induced to take the school, and whose plan it was to combine religious with mental teachings for these young barbarians.

The method gave great offense to the Kaidger boys and they played a sly but outrageous prank to bring him to confusion. For a week they pretended to have great respect for him, some of them even pretending to become "converted." They so easily deceived the poor man, who was certainly well meaning, if not very shrewd, that he went about openly rejoicing over the good work he had wrought upon them.

But his eyes must have been painfully opened two mornings later, when, after coolly informing him that "this sort of thing was played out," the young barbarians seized him and carried him into the woods, bound him fast to the top of a young birch tree, which they had bent down by main strength, and then let it go.

The poor man was hurled upward and left dangling fifteen feet from the ground; and it was two or three hours before his distressed shouts brought him any assistance. Legal punishment was threatened for this act, but I am sorry to say the threat was not acted upon.

There was no more school that winter. A sign, "To Let," was nailed by the boys on the front door of the school house, and each one of the brutal clique made it a point to smash a pane of glass every time he went past. As a result, the "temple of science" at Kaidger Hill was soon in a deplorable condition.

The following autumn a young land surveyor named Ammi Bray came into the township to "run" certain lots of wild land. The people liked his appearance. He was rather above medium height and muscular; but his distinguishing feature were his eyes, which were very noticeably blue, and had a habit of dwelling with unusual steadiness upon any person with whom he was speaking. When he had been at the Hill a few weeks the school agent asked him one day whether he had ever taught school.

"Never," replied Ammi Bray.

"Wal, I don't keer ef yer never did," exclaimed the agent; "I want yer tu take our scule this winter."

"But, my dear man," replied Mr. Bray, "it would not be, from all accounts, a good place for an amateur. Besides, though I know something of mathematics, and once knew a little grammar and geography, I do not feel qualified to teach."

"I dunno's I keer ef ye don't know B from a bull's foot," exclaimed the the perplexed agent. "What I want is a man that can whop them confounded boys! Thar'll never be no scule here till they're whopped and cowed. And I believe you're the man to do it. But I tell ye what! they're a parcel of hyannys!" he added almost doubtfully. "I dunno, sometimes, as the man walks as ken whop um!"

Ammi Bray took a day to think of it; and then he told the gratified agent that he would take the school. This was in November. The winter term began on the first Monday in December.

Thus we find the young surveyor on his way to the log schoolhouse that Monday morning, "just rounding the turn by the alders," as Nat Durfee said, and the Kaidger boys waiting to "s'lute him."

And the moment he showed his face in the doorway they saluted him! From a dozen lusty throats was poured fourth a chorus of raspy whinings and brays—as a personal insult to his peculiar name of Bray.

But Ammi walked in coolly, and seemed not at all disturbed. He paid no attention to the brayings, but took possession of the master's desk; and presently called the school to order, bidding them all choose and take seats for the term. But his steady blue eyes were so assertive of his authority that somehow the riotous Kaiders were a little disturbed themselves.

Something, perhaps, in the muscular ease with which the new master tossed the great "foresticks" and "back logs" into the broad fireplace served to hold them in check that day. Then, too, his manner of giving and hearing lessons was off-hand and manly. For once they felt hesitation in beginning the "war" and for the next four days following their first mutinous salute they were impelled to behave quite well. But it would never do to let him rule them a whole week; their reputation as the champion master-hoisters in the county was at stake.

The eighth day of December was one of those bitterly cold days which sometime dawn on New England at this season. A cold wave had come down over night. That morning the thermometer stood 14 degrees below zero, and the wind blew piercingly keen.

It was a cold walk from the schoolhouse, and on his arrival there Master Ammi found matters in anything but a pleasant and satisfactorily condition. Apparently the chimney had refused its ordinary function. There was no doubt. The room was full of smoke, and the children stood shivering and coughing about the fireplace.

The five large boys above mentioned were sitting on the forward benches, pretending to study; but something in their manner caused the master to feel that mischief was intended.

"This is a bad fire for so cold a morning," he remarked. "Who laid it?"

"Jote Yates!" exclaimed Sally Briggs, spitefully, "and it seems to be stuffed up. But it can't be that anything's in the chimney," she added sarcastically, "for I see Jote on the roof looking into it as I came along to school."

"Something in the chimney?" repeated the master, innocently. "What can it be?"

He saw the trap at once, but for reasons of his own he choose to walk into it, and stepping forward he got partly down on his knees, with his back to the boys, and essayed up the broad flue.

This was the very thing the Kaidgers were lying in wait for. With a shout they all sprang upon him, pulling him backward on the floor, and then began dragging him through the door and along the covered way opening into the log woodshed, or "trap."

Somewhat to their surprise the master did not offer much resistance. "Don't be so rough with me, boys," he said, in what they thought a rather queer tone.

In a moment more they had him in the woodhouse—just where they wanted him they thought—but just where he wanted them really.

No sooner were they all inside than the athletic, but hitherto passive, Ammi Bray suddenly turned the tables by bounding to his feet like a Hercules and delivering two lightning blows which sent Jote and Ziby headlong and with tremendous force against the others. Before they had time to rally or even to breathe the master was out at the door and had hasped it upon them.

Never were five conspirators more completely taken aback.

"You will remain there, boys," said Ammi, through the door, "till you can appreciate a good fire!"

With this parting salutation, the master went back to the schoolroom. After some delay the wad of brush and turf was removed from the chimney, and lessons proceeded as usual, without the Kaidgers.

Thanks to their own precautions, the outer door of the woodshed had been securely barricaded; the mutineers were hopelessly prisoners, and ere long began to shiver in the cold wind which whistled through the chinks between the logs.

"Yer don't believe he means to keep us here all day, do ye?" whined Nat, at length.

"Yis, I du," snarled Ziby, rubbing a very puffy black and blue bunch over his right eye.

"Jes' like' im tu. I tell ye he's a regular blue pill, he is. Look at my eye!"

"Wal, we'd a sarved him the same sarse ef he hadn't up an' gut the better on us," said Joe.

But there was no great comfort in that reflection, with the thermometer at 13 degrees below zero.

"We'll be laft at by the hull town," growled Cuffy; and then each began to lay the blame on the other.

But they soon had to bestir themselves to keep from freezing, and, after doing their best, they were soon thoroughly chilled.

After a time they began shouting to be released, but two doors intervened between them and the school room, and a high wind was blowing.

Noon came, and the noon recess passed. No one went near them, and by 3 o'clock in the afternoon they were so benumbed and so near freezing that they were ready to accept succor on almost any terms.

Perhaps it was for this that Master Ammi had waited; for not much after 3 o'clock he called up little Asa Foster and bade him go out to the "minister's" tree, as the children called the yellow birch to the top of which poor Mr. Wentworth had been tied by the Kaiders, and cut ten sticks, each as big as the butt end of a whipstock.

When these had been brought in, Master Ammi first warmed them before the fireplace and twisted them a little, and then he went to the door of the woodhouse and asked the captive Kaidgers if they were cold, and whether they would like to come in and get warmed.

"Yes! yes!" they roared. "Let us out! Let us out!" He could hear their teeth chatter.

"Well," replied the master, "you can come into the schoolroom, one at a time, and get warmed. Do you agree to that?"

"Yes, yes" they chattered.

"Well, then, Jad may come first," said the master, and he opened the door partly, but stood ready to force it to if the Kaidgers showed bad faith.

Jad squeezed out, and the master, after hasping the door upon the others, escorted him into the schoolroom. Half frozen, the youngster rushed towards the fireplace: but Master Ammi laid a heavy hand on his collar.

"Not so fast," said he. "I did not say you were to have fire heat. I have something that will better suit your case," and he pointed to the pile of big birch withes.

"You great boys," continued Mr. Bray, earnestly, "have abused your teachers here for years. Some you have maltreated, even put in peril of their lives. Those were mean, ruffianly tricks. That was a cruel, fiendish outrage on Mr. Wentworth, who was honestly trying to do good. You meant to use me in the same way this morning. But the day of retribution has come to you. 'Poetic justice' is about to be executed. I doubt if you have much appreciation of poetic justice, Jad Day, but you will soon feel the force of it.

Jad howled and squirmed.

But it was not until a second withe was reduced to a mere stub in the stalwart master's hand that there was any visible lull in the proceedings.

"Are you warm now, Jad Day?"

"Ow, ow! Yes, yes! O, I naver'll do nothin' agin you agin—naver will naver will!"

"Take your hat, then, and go home," said Master Ammi; and he now proceeded to let out Jote Yates.

Jote was as tall as the master. He had on a thick coat. After hearing a speech similar to that which greeted Jad he was sternly bidden to take off his coat.

Sullenly he refused, and backed into the corner; but with one jerk the master took the coat clean off from the fellow except the two sleeves on his arms; and it is doubtful whether the annals of the school districts can furnish an instance to match the "birching" that Jote then received.

And that is affirming a great deal, as some of our old readers with good memories will no doubt agree with me.

Completely cowed, smarting from head to heels, but effectually warmed, the ring-leader of the Kaidgers was in turn sent home—behind Jad. And then Cuffy, Nat and Ziby were in their turn admitted to their equitable share of the yellow birch stimulent.

The ten withes were used up, the floor liberally sprinkled with the bits, and the five Kaidgers were sent homeward, in Indian-file, all warm.

A good job had been done. The backbone of riot and rebellion at Kaidger Hill was effectually broken.

Jote left the place in a few days and went to work in the "logging swamp." After a week had passed the other four boys came to school and were made to study. Odd as it may seem, they came to be on pretty good terms with Master Ammi before the twelve weeks of school were past; and later in life Jad Day often said that Master Ammi was the best teacher he ever had.

Mr. Bray taught the school at Kaidger Hill for three winters in succession, and from being the worst school in the county he made it one of the most orderly and best.

The Clever Women.

Here are some notes about the clever women: Mrs. Humphrey Ward, author of "Robert Elsmere," than which no book has been so widely read and universally approved since "Adam Bede" appeared, is said to be a small, slight woman, as was George Elliot, too, by the way, and has a colorless face, soft thick, dark hair, which she wears very smooth and plain; a large nose, like Eliot again, and her eyes are small black and very piercing.

The author of "The story of an African Farm," which has had only less success than "Robert Elsmere," is an English governess who was born at the Cape, of mixed German and English parentage, the daughter of a missionary, who died and left her at the age of eleven years, alone and friendless. The early years of her life were full of the most dreadful hardships and cruelties, and much of the more melancholy parts of the book are autobiographical. Her real name is Olive Schreiner, though she calls herself Ralph Iron.

Vernon Lee is another author who has chosen to write under a pseudonym, her true title being Violet Paget. Her novel, "Miss Brown," raises the same storm in England that "The Quick or the Dead" did here, and since then she has confined herself to writing essays on all sorts of subjects, and very remarkable ones they are. She is plain, large and very masculine in appearance. Doesn't care much about women's frills and fancies, and is an inveterate cigarette smoker, always having one between the fingers of her left hand while she writes or reads.

Edna Lyall, the author of those semi-religious novels, "Donovan," "We Too," etc., which have had an enormous circulation both in England and this country, is a woman of some means, and has no great need for the large sums of money accruing from the books, which she wrote more for pleasure than with the idea of making her fortune. She has been carefully laying away all the profits from "Donovan," and with it has bought a peal of bells for the church at Eastbourne, where she lives. They were hung the other day and dedicated with much ceremony in the presence of the whole village and a crowd of her admirers and readers, who had come from every part of England for the occasion.

Mrs. Mary Labouchere, wife of the editor of London Truth, whose contributions to the World in the shape of foreign letters are familiar to all its readers, is an ardent politician, and shares the advanced Liberal views of her husband. Latterly she has been making political speeches in England to the accompaniment of the most enthusiastic applause from her hearers.

The only female political speakers in this country, until within the last few years, have been Anna Dickinson and Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, who are both engaged to make stump speeches for the Republican party during this campaign. But since the rise of the Prohibitionists as a party women have taken an active and eloquent part in the political contests. Miss Frances Willard talks in public for her party frequently, and all the women Prohibitionists throw themselves into the contests with the utmost eagerness, speaking writing and working for their ticket. So far the Democrats have not enlisted female influence. The Republicans have started in Chicago a Young Women's Campaign Republican club, that is electioneering for Harrison and Morton, and some branches of the club have been formed in outlying towns. The Democrats point to Mrs. Cleveland as a specimen of the Democrat woman.—New York World.

The Oatmeal Question.

New York Graphic: You can get all the opinion you want on both sides of a question now-a-days. Oatmeal had not long been reputed to be healthful food when some physician arose to deny it and to assert that it produced dyspepsia. Allowance is always to be made in such a question for the variation of human stomachs and constitutions, so that what may be good for one person may not be good for another. The truth about oatmeal for the generality of persons (and they are the only persons you can speak for) is that if it is eaten in only a partially cooked condition, it is not healthful; and neither is flour, corn meal and many other articles of food. Indigestion and acidity of stomach are caused for some people by the eating of sugar or other sweets on oatmeal, and they get the same effect if they eat the sweets on rice or bread. Cream, too, may be too much fat for a sensitive stomach, if put on oatmeal. In these cases it is not the oatmeal, but either it is insufficient preparation or the addition of an improper food, that causes the stomach trouble. If a person will eat a moderate amount of oatmeal, cooked and prepared as his needs may demand, there can be no question that it is healthful, digestible and highly nutritious.

Are Parents Responsible?

From Good Housekeeping.

The responsibility of parents in training children to make successful men and women is not realized by many parents as it should be; but not upon them alone does this accountability devolve, it is shared by all who are brought in contact with these little gatherers of knowledge. There are circumstances sometimes beyond the control of parents that modify and counteract the teaching of their children and make or mar their successful manhood.

A child's brain may be aptly compared to the sensitive plate of the photographer. It needs but a moment's exposure to good or bad influences, either of deportment or speech, to imprint upon its surface the lines that make a good or bad impression. We are not as parents sufficiently alive to the fact, that this highly sensitive organ is being continually recording both the good and bad alike, as it is subjected to these influences; and too, like the sensitive plate, it gives the clearest impression of those things to which it is exposed the longest, and parents are being daily shamed or edified, often the former, by the impressions imprinted on these little brains coming to light.

Among the circumstances spoken of is an atmosphere laden with the sayings, doing and wearings of others; need I say, matter not calculated either to enrich or ennoble speaker or hearer; the more frequently dealing with the faults and follies of others, not to be mentioned outside the circle in which they are committed and then with bated breath. Of the authors of such Addison says: "A third kind of female orator may be comprehended under the word gossip. Mrs. Fiddle Faddle is perfectly accomplished in this sort of eloquence; she launches out into dissertations upon the edging of a petticoat; runs divisions upon a head dress; knows every dish of meat that is served in her neighborhood; and entertains her company a whole afternoon with the wit of her little boy before he is able to speak."

It is very hard in a mixed household to keep the watchful eye and ear from seeing and hearing much that is harmful and especially where there is a Mrs. Fiddle Faddle.

That the continuous hearing of this sort of "eloquence" is pernicious to the young is to put it mildly. It soon bears fruit, the little one, if she is a girl—and girls are more impressed by this kind of talk—begins to say of a visitor "Mrs. M. had on a blue overskirt:" "Mrs. T. had her hair banged;" "Florence has the measels;" and telling, as they are remembered, conversations ad nauseam, fit only to be heard only by grown people, and they the Fiddle Faddles. The little mind thus continually exposed, the faculty grows,—these things become second nature, and if radical natures are not taken to counteract these tendencies, in coming years another is added to the Fiddle-Faddle family.

Another error made by parents, and lending to same result, is laughing and tacitly encouraging the children when such smart (!) observations—in the very nature of the above—are made, instead of admonishing or passing them over in silence.

It cannot be too strongly insisted upon, that as the twig is bent so will the tree be inclined, and if a child breathes an atmosphere laden with dissertations on the edging of petticoats, what Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Jones said, what they had for dinner, and perhaps tinctured with malice—or at least uncharitableness—in coming years it will develope a fondness for this sort of edification and these sort of people, to the exclusion of those nobler thoughts and feelings that go to make the perfect man or woman.

Finger-Nails.

Our finger-nails grow out about three times a year; they should be trimmed with scissors once a week, not so close as to leave no room for the dirt to gather, for then they do not protect the ends of the fingers, as was designed by nature; besides, if trimmed too close at the corners, there is danger of their growing into the flesh, causing inconvenience, and sometimes great pain. The collections under the ends of the nails should not be removed by anything harder than a brush or a soft piece of wood; nor should the nails be scraped with a penknife or other metallic substance, as it destroys the delicacy of their structure and will at length give them an unnatural thickness.

We are not favorably impressed as to the cleanliness of a person who keeps his nails trimmed to the quick, as it is often done to prevent dirt gathering there; whereas if a margin were allowed, it would be an index to the cleanliness of the hands, from which the collections under the finger-nails are made. Leave a margin, then, and the moment you observe that these collections need removal, you may know that the hands need washing, when they and the nails are both cleaned together.

Most persons are familiar with those troublesome bits of skin which loosen at the roots of the finger-nails; it is caused by the skin adhering to the nail, which growing outward drags the skin along with it, stretching it until one end gives way. To prevent this, the skin should be loosened from the nail once a week, not with a knife or scissors, but with something blunt, such as the end of an ivory paper cutter; this is best done after soaking the fingers in warm water, then pushing the skin back gently and slowly; the white specks on the nails are made by scraping the nail with a knife at a point where it emerges from the skin.

Biting off the finger-nails is an uncleanly practice, for thus the unsightly collections at the ends are kept eaten clean! Children may be broken of such a filthy habit by causing them to dip the ends of their fingers several times a day in wormwood bitters, without letting them know the object. If this is not sufficient, cause them to wear caps on each finger until the practice is discontinued.—Hall's Journal of Health.

LOOKING FOR SHARKS.

"The Singapore Trading company, limited," was and is an organization owning half a dozen brigs and schooners which voyage among the islands of the Indian ocean and traffic for pepper, spices, cinnamon, beeswax, figs, rare woods, medicinal roots and herbs, etc. On one occasion—this was twenty years ago—this company received an order from Sydney, Australia, for a great quantity of sharks' brains. It seemed that some eminent quack doctor in the colony had made the discovery that sharks' brains was the great panacea the medical world had been looking for to cure all diseases. They were dried and then pulverized and mixed with a certain root, and, as silly as it may look to you, the people went wild over the new cure.

When the order was received at Singapore I was mate of a small schooner called the Little Duke, and it was planned that I should be set ashore on some of the islands to the north of Australia to fill it. I had voyaged from Singapore to Torres' strait several times, and after a little talk I selected South Aroo Island as the most convenient place for carrying out the purpose. There are seven of these island in a group off the New Guinea coast. While the water from the Straits of Malacca to those of Torres are really the Indian ocean, they are laid down on maps and charts as different seas—Java, Flores, Banda and Arafura. We had once been cast away on the coast of South Aroo, and had found the waters almost alive with sharks. We knew it to be uninhabited, and about twenty miles long by ten broad.

Our outfit was very simple. I was to have a couple of men with me, and we took a tent, a lot of shark lines, a couple of lances, and bedding and provisions. For firearms we had revolvers and double barreled shotguns, and after a long and tedious voyage, during which we called at several islands, we finally cast anchor off South Aroo, and were safely landed on a Sandy beach! The schooner was in haste to get away, and two hours after landing us she was out of sight. We were to be left on the island from fourteen to twenty days. Near where we landed was what sailors call a rip, that is, a narrow channel between the main land and a sand bar. This channel was about sixty feet wide, fifteen or twenty feet deep, and open at both ends. The sand bar was not over four feet above high tide, half a mile long, and not so much as a spear of grass grew upon it. We didn't have to look twice to see that this rip was our sharking ground. A dozen dorsal fins could be seen catting the water, and a piece of salt pork flung out resulted in a fight, in which a score of the monsters participated. We erected our tent in the edge of the forest, set up our windlass above high water, and next morning after landing were already to begin work. Our method of proceeding was very simple. Our windlass was a roller, provided with a handle on either end and resting in crotchets. One end of the shark line was made fast to this, and the hook at the other was bated and flung out. When a shark was fast we brought him in by turning the windlass. While the two men turned I stood at the edge of the water with a lance and jabbed him as he got near enough.

There may be spots where the shark is more numerous than off the New Guinea coast, but I doubt it. There was no waiting about the business of catching them. No sooner was the baited hook thrown in than a shark seized it and was fast. They were not ground sharks, nor shovel noses, but the genuine man eater, ranging from nine to fifteen feet in length, and terribly strong and fierce. An ordinary man would be snapped in two by one of these fishes as easily as a boy bites into a cracker. We had to secure the brains and spread them in the sun to dry, and this made it slow work. Our catch the first day was seventeen. We increased this to twenty on the second day, and for four days maintained that figure. On the afternoon of the fourth day a sad calamity occurred. The spring at which we got our water was about 400 feet inland, and we had cut a path to it. We had seen a few snakes, but they seemed desirous of avoiding us as much as possible, and none of us were alarmed about them. On this afternoon, as one of my helpers went after water, he was struck by a snake lying in the tangle, and although he was back within five minutes, I could tell by his looks that he had received a deadly bite. In ten minutes he was rolling on the ground in agony, and in fifteen his body began to swell. While he had not seen the serpent, we had no doubt of its species. It is known in the east as the collar snake, and is found on all the islands in the Indian ocean. It attains a length of two feet, and has a white ring or collar about its neck. There is no more poisonous snake. In forty minutes from the time the man received the bite he was dead, and his body was a terrible sight to look at.

When we had buried our companion in the sands we loaded our guns with fine shot and went snake hunting. We killed a round dozen of the collar snakes between the tent and the spring, and felt assured that the firing would rid the neighborhood of any which had escaped us. They had probably been drawn that way by the scent of the blood and meat. The tragedy had upset us both, and neither was inclined to sleep that night. It was well that we were in wakeful mood. Ever since the Indian sea was navigated by European vessels there has been more or less piracy. At this time almost every island had its boss wrecker, who was no better than a pirate. While not daring to attack a ship, if she was caught in distress it went hard with her. It was a quiet, starlight night, and I was sitting outside the tent while my comrade was lying down inside, when I caught a sound from the water which alarmed me. As I rose up and advanced I caught sight of a native craft stealing into the rip from the lower side. She was from the Pindo islands, to the north of us, and was a spice boat. She had a single mast and a lateen sail, and during a calm was pulled by oars. I ran back to my companion and we crept forward on hand and knees to discover the object of the visit. Had the men been honest they would have been talking and singing. They would not have come into the rip had they not known of our presence, and the fact of their coming so quietly boded ill for us. The craft was grounded about 100 feet above us, and twelve or fifteen natives leaped out on the beach.

When we had seen this much we returned to our tent, secured the three guns and coarse ammunition and took up our stations between the tent and the water. In five minutes we had burrowed our rifle pits and charged the guns with buckshot. It was not for us to open the fight. We could just make out the group of figures around the boat, and they would soon let us know whether they were our friends or enemies. We had just got fairly settled when we saw the crowd stealing over the sands in the direction of the tent. All had spears and clubs, and their caucious movements proved them bent on mischief. When they had come up quite close to the tent they raised a loud yell and dashed forward, hurling their spears and swinging their clubs, and it was two or three minutes before they discovered that the tent was unoccupied. Then, as they huddled together, we opened fire. They were not more than sixty feet away, and the buckshot had to tell. There were screams and shouts and a stampede. All broke for the best—all who were on their feet after our fire. Two or three men had been left in charge of the craft, and as soon as they heard the firing and yelling a panic seized them and they crushed the boat off, sprang into her and made off down the rip. Nine natives were thus left in the lurch. They raised a great outcry, calling and commanding, but those in the boat did not even reply.

The situation was this: We had the fellows penned up on a neck of sand without cover, and we had firearms and they had none. I have no doubt we had been spied upon before they came to make the attack, and very likely they believed there were three of us. They were afraid to attack us, and as for surrender it was not to be thought of. In the five years I sailed among the islands I never knew a quarrel between white men and natives to terminate in a draw. One party or the other ran away or were wiped out. These wreckers had meant to butcher us. Had I offered them terms, they would have refused. Had they captured us alive, they would have lanced us off hand, and been astonished at the protest. Lying in our rifle pits, we both realized that it was a question of the survival of the strongest, and that we would have no relief until the last man was wiped out. We heard them chattering and cursing for an hour or so, the leader evidently seeking to work their courage up to the attacking point, and then all was quiet.

Daylight came at last, and what was our astonishment to discover that the nine had crossed the channel to the sand bar, leaving most of their weapons on the main shore. We also soon discovered why they had braved the sharks to reach that spot. The boat had run down the rip, circled around outside the surf, which was very light there, and attempted to land on the head of the bar. The fellows had swam over expecting to be taken off, but the craft had struck a rock and filled and sunk in fifteen feet of water. There must have been three men with her, for the number on the bar was now twelve. The only explanation of why the sharks did not seize any of the nine was that they had followed the boat out and around. Well, that was the situation, and no two men ever had a neater drop on a gang of cut throats. They had their knives alone, while we had shotguns, and it would have been the easiest sort of work to bowl them over in succession by off hand shots. By our volley when attacked we had killed three and wounded a fourth so that he could not leave the spot. That made the strength of the attacking party sixteen.

I could talk all the lingoes of the islands, and I asked the wounded man who they were and why they had attacked us. He said the boat was from Pindos, and the name of her captain was Abyan. They had attacked us for the sole object of plunder. The fellow had several buckshot in his left groin and others in his leg, and I told him he was fatally wounded.

"It was so written," he calmly replied. "Be so kind as to finish me."

"Kill you?"

"Certainly. I would do as well by you."

"But I cannot do it."

"Then I will. I waited for morning, in hopes my friends would kill you, but as they have not, and as all must die, I will go first."

He had his naked knife in his hand, and before I could move to prevent he drew it across his throat, and two minutes later was dead. We now had the living to look out for. As I told you, it was only about sixty feet across the rip, and we could look right into their eyes. A more bloodthirsty dozen could not have been scraped together in the east. Had they been humbled by the situation I should at least hoped to see them get away; but they were not. On the contrary, they were brazen and defiant. As soon as they saw us moving they uttered shouts of defiance and brandished their knives, and because we did not begin shooting they taunted us with cowardice.

Just what steps to take I did not know. I stood guard while my companion prepared breakfast, but there was little fear of any of them crossing the channel. The sharks had came in until they actually crowded each other, and out beyond the surf we could see their dorsal fins by the score. The natives saw the situation in all its dangers, but they continued defiant. I called to ask them why they had attacked us, as we had done them no harm and were not trespassing on domain, and the leader shouted back:

"You are a dog! You are not fit to live! Yes, you are a dog and a coward! I have wet my hands in the blood of half a hundred white faced dogs, and I am only sorry that I haven't your heart to throw to these fishes!"

"Well, what are you going to do?" I asked as I choked back my anger.

"What is it to you, dog! Come! You are a coward. Now that it is daylight you tremble before us and dare not shoot! Ha! I believe you will run away!"

My companion was for killing them off at once, but I was more merciful. While I knew they thirsted for my blood, and would kill me it they got the chance, it seemed awful to shoot them down in their helpless situation. After breakfast we sat down opposite them with our guns in our hands, when those who had knives began to flourish them and their taunts were renewed. The leader finally worked himself up to such a pitch of anger that he threw his knife across at me. It came whirling and whistling through the air and entered the sand beside me. I replied with a snap shot which stretched him dead. His fall only enraged the others, and I had scarcely finished reloading when my companion said:

"Take care. They are going to try and swim the channel!"

They scattered along the bar its full length, like skirmishers going to the front, and at a given signal all sprang into the water. Had there been no sharks we could have answered for every black head crossing the channel. By spreading out they hoped to distract the attention of the monsters, and reasoned that a portion of them would get over to attack us. But there were too many sharks. For about five minutes the sight was terrible. It seemed as if there were three or four sharks for every victim, and they fought over the feast like so many tigers. Not a man lived to make twenty strokes toward us. In ten minutes after I fired my shot we were rid of the whole gang and were ready to resume our labors, nor were we annoyed again before the schooner took us off.—New York Sun.

Best Things for the Complexion.

Cleanliness, perfect cleanliness, usually means a healthy, and, therefore, a beautiful skin, for as a bright New York writer remarks, "It matters less what a woman puts on her face than what she takes off." Pure white castile is generally acknowledged to be the best soap for the complexion unless expensive toilet soaps can be used. The highly-colored and highly-perfumed soaps will spoil the best of complexions in short order. Some ladies use no soap at all, believing that it irritates and roughens the skin. Hot water, they argue, answers every purpose so far as the face is concerned. It is not wise to use soap on the face during the day, but just before retiring a thorough washing with plenty of hot water, castile soap and a soft cloth, is imperative. Vaseline or cold cream may be applied for the night and washed off in the morning with a little ammonia in hot water.

Soft water is the best to wash in, but where it cannot be had a good substitute may be made by adding a few drops of ammonia or borax to the hard water in common use. The princess of Wales uses distilled water which costs about 20 cents a gallon. To whiten the skin a few drops of spirits of camphor may be added to hot water once or twice a week.

Some authorities claim that cloths and sponges are injurious to complexions, that only hands should be used in washing, and that the face should be dried on a soft towel without friction. Others recommend the use of soft merino or flannel washcloths and a gentle friction, and all agree that it is best to wash the face only twice a day, at morning and at night. It may be kept perfectly clean during the day by wiping it with a piece of soft linen. The use of almond meal on the linen cloth is recommended, and ladies who have used it agree in praising its virtues.

A famous belle, on being asked how she kept her complexion beautiful in spite of the wear of social life, replied that the recipe was simple—"Hot water and plenty of sleep."

Police Surveillance in Russia.

The only shade of discomfort which an American may meet in traveling in Russia comes from their system of espionage, and that is more in imagination than reality. Probably no country in Europe has such a thorough system of police surveillance.

As soon as you reach their border your passport given up and registered. When you arrive at your hotel you give it up again and it is at once sent to police headquarters, and you are again registered. Whenever you change your location you do the same thing, and in this way the landlord everywhere is made responsible to the goverment for the foreigners under his roof. Then, when you wish to leave the country, you must again send your passport to the police office and obtain a permit, which is good for only three days, and which is attached to your passport and removed at the last Russian station on the Austrian or German frontier. So that your passport contains a complete record of when and where you entered the country, just where you have been and how long you have remained. Yet with all this you have no consciousness of being watched and you probably are not, when the authorities are not, when the authorities are once satisfied as regards your nationality and good character. And after all the plots that have been formed against the goverment in foreign countries, is it any wonder that they should consider these precautions necessary?--

MARRIAGE IN CHINA,

Life's Flower, Love, as Found in the Flowery Kingdom.

From the Brooklyn Citizen.

"A Chinese love letter! Have I any old-fashioned Chinese love letters in my trunk? Have I gilt-edged Chinese billet-doux with a monogram like a cow's track? There was never a love letter written in Chinese. No Chinese maiden ever penned a billet-doux or sent a valentine."

Rather sadly was this said by a romantic young Chinaman, Mr. Hong Wing, who is noted among the Chinese for the skill with which he plays on the mandolin.

"In China," continued he, "a man never sees his wife until he is wedded to her for life, and sometimes he does not see her then, for she may refuse to remove her veil until three days have elapsed after the wedding. If he doesn't like her he cannot get a divorce, but he may marry another wife, and then another, until he has gone through the blindfold lottery often enough to get one that suits him. Some of these Chinese Crœsuses have hundreds of wives. There was an old bachelor who took it into his head to get married one winter, and he married two hundred wives before he got through. The last wife is the favorite, but the first one is the boss."

"If a man never sees his wife before their wedding, how does he make love to her?"

"He doesn't make love to her. His mother arranges the match, and his future mother-in-law makes love to him. It is a sour courtship. Children are formally engaged to other children that they have never seen, at the tender age of 9 or 10, and after an engagement of ten or twelve years, they get married."

"Does a Chinaman ever marry his cousin?"

"No, a marriage of cousins was never heard of in China. A man may no more marry his cousin in China than in England a man may marry his deceased wife's sister. You talk about your old families here, and your old families are only five generations old. In China families are seventy-five and eighty generations old, and every member has a complete record of his ancestors for all these generations. The remotest kinship prevents marriages in China, and if two families have the faintest imaginable kinship seventy-five generations back their children cannot marry.

What are the most common families in your country?"

"The Chens, the Wongs and the Lees. The Chens are the Smiths of China, the Wongs are the Joneses, and the Lees are the Browns. A Mr. Chen would marry a Miss Wong, but he wouldn't marry a Miss Chen. Perhaps that is the reason why the old folks make the matches. It prevents the Chens from falling in love with one another."

"Are the Chinese ladies cultivated?"

"Oh, yes; they can read and write, draw, paint and embroider. They never go out on the street with their husbands. If a Chinese man and woman were to walk on the street arm-in-arm in their country as American men and women do, they would be mobed. The women stay indoors. If they wish to visit their mothers they take conveyances. Sometimes they may be seem walking in the park with their children."

"You are married?"

"Yes."

"To a Chinese lady?"

"No; to an American. I came to this country when but 11 years old. Though I was 9,000 miles from China, my mother betrothed me to a little Chinese girl I had never seen. My mother used to write to me how small her feet were, how pretty she was, and what a beautiful cat-like nose she had. When I was 20 years old mother sent me a letter, saying I was old enough to get married, and must come back to China and marry the girl."

"What did you think about it?"

"I thought I was old enough, and so fell heels over cue in love with an American girl in Nevada, and married her. We had our pictures taken, and I sent one to my mother, together with an account of the wedding, which I translated from an American paper into Chinese."

"What happened?"

"The next thing I knew my uncle and four cousins came on to United States and had me arrested for bigamy. I was taken before a court and tried. My uncle went on the stand and swore that I had a wife in China."

"What did you do then?"

"I thought I was in a box, as you Americans say. The Judge asked the witnesses how old I was when I left China. They replied that my mother had picked her out for me, and that, in Chinese law, was the same as marriage. The Judge said that they didn't have any Chinese statutes in this country, and my uncle innocently replied that he would send to China for some. Everybody in the court laughed, and, as I lived in the town ever since I came to America, all knew that I had left China a little boy, so the jury acquitted me. My uncle told the Judge that he would be beheaded when he went back to China, which was a monstrous fib with which he intended to scare the Judge. I have never been back to China, and suppose the little girl whom I never saw is a grass widow. Poor child!"

Why Men Don't Marry,

From the Toledo Blade.

The newspaper paragraphs, the column articles, even the books which are written to show the reason why so many young men remain bachelors, is because girls are so extravagant in their tastes that it is impossible to provide such homes and living as they demand, can not be counted. A great deal of this is the veriest bosh. It is the exception rather than the rule for a young man to remain single, if he wants to marry. He thinks if the girl of his heart is willing to go with him, they can rub along somehow, and many times it proves to be the severest kind of rubbing. If a yound man don't marry, set it down that he didn't want to give up his free, easy-going, independent life; to deny himself his wine and cigars; to be obliged to think for somebody else besides himself; in short, to assume the burdens and responsibilities of a family man. The girl he thinks he loves need not worry over his loss, not a bit, for he is too selfish to make her a good husband.

Sleeplessness and its Remedies.

Sleeplessness, writes a contributor to Cassell's Magazine, in probably nine cases out of ten, is caused by continual mental strain or worry. The capilaries of the brain become stretched, and lose their resiliency; they are unable, therefore, to empty themselves of blood when the hour of rest comes round, and so wakefulness continues far into the night until the body is fairly worn out and sinks into the lethargy of exhaustion.

It will be well for people who suffer thus to at once take a holiday. You say you can not, that business will not permit you. I doubt this very much. Would you really throw your life or probably your reason away for the sake of business? The question is one you ought to try to answer. But it is my privilege to tell you that in the early stage of sleeplessness, a few weeks stay at a bracing seaside place often acts like magic; people return home restored to health and calm—return home to positively wonder that the cares and worries that so bothered them could have been such bogies.

Above all other remedies for sleeplessness I place change of air and change of scene, in conjuntion with plain nutritious diet and a more natural way of living.

Why can I not sleep? It may be that you really have—unknown to you—some functional derangement of the liver, the stomach or the heart. This must be removed, and sleep will return to your pillow, and with it health.

Think and consider whether of late you have given way to any table indiscretion that may have affected the liver and rendered it either sluggish or too active. In this case the blood will in reality have become poisoned and contaminated with bile, the mind becomes dull and probably gloomy all day and overactive towards nightfall. The sure indication of treatment is to strictjy regulate the diet for a few weeks, to take an occasional blue pill at night, with a glass of Pullna water half an hour before breakfast, and to take a course of Turish baths (if permited by your own medical adviser), with a reasonable amount of exercise in the open air.

Dyspepsia will produce sleeplessness, and may in ordinary cases be cured in the same way, though aperients should rather be avoided. Most careful regulation of diet is, however a sine qua non.

It is not a good plan to go to bed with an entirely empty stomach. Again, if the body feels hot, a cold bath, followed by a bottle of soda water and fifteen grains of the bicarbonate of soda, will have a good effect. Sometimes a hot bath will do more good than a cold one; the state of ones own feeling is to be consulted, and the results made a mental note of.

Do you smoke much? If so, a return to health is not to be expected until the habit is overcome.

Exercise in abundance taken during the day in the open air is in hundreds of cases a cure for sleeplessness, but this exercise should not be of a too fatiguing kind; it should be spread over a great many hours; it should be pleasant, calming exercise, and not continued up to a late hour.

Overfatigue must be carefully avoided.

The practice of taking stimulants to any extent is very apt to produce sleeplessness by keeping up unnatural excitement of the brain.

Wine negue has been recommended for a nightcap, and even stronger stimulants. They should only be perscribed by a medical man, for they are narcotics, and narcotics in any form tend to make matters worse in the long run.

Well, then, what I wish particularly to impress upon my readers is the fact that the cause of sleeplessness must be sought out and removed before there can be the slightest chance or hope of anything like a permanent cure.

Then hygiene steps in for good—regulation of diet and of your entire and complete method of living.

Rise betimes and have that bracing cold bath, with a few handfuls of sea-salt in it, eat some fruit before breakfast, notably prunes, oranges, grapes or stewed apples. Avoid tea and coffee and cigar allurements. Take no kind of stimulant on an empty stomach. Avoid fret and care and overexcitement during the day. Determine—if you can—that nothing shall annoy or irritate you.

Take exercise—you must, even though at great expense and inconvenience.

Cycling in moderation, and with-out "spurting" or rushing up hills, is the best and most delightful of exercises, but beware of catching cold; always change a damp undergarment before sitting down to dinner, and previously to redressing, it will be found most refreshing to rub the body with a cold wet sponge, then to dry with a rough towel. Never eat when fatigued. Dine early, live plainly, take nothing that is the least likely to disagree with you.

Look upon narcotics in any shape as poison.

And now a word or two about the bed-room itself. The room should be large, most cleanly and free from dust, with a proper system of ventilation by door and window.

Reverence in the Sanctuary.

The Rev. Dr. John Hall has spoken upon this subject with directness and force. His remarks in reference to the close of worship are to be earnestly commended:

"I could sometimes wish that you did not leave your pew so abruptly and prompty as you do the moment the last syllable of the benediction has been pronounced. There is no need that you should have your hat in your hand; no need that you should have the great coat on your shoulder; nor yet that, the moment the last syllable is pronounced, doors should be thrown open as though you were eager and impatient until the thing had come to a close. It would be well—it would be better—more in harmony with those outward expressions of reverence—if there were a moment's silence, a silent pause indicating that when the service is closed you have not been eager for its close, and then it is yours to go away in the hopeful confidence that God, who has been reverently waited upon by you, and whose benediction has been pronounced over you in His name and by His authority, would go with you and help you to make the the rest of your life, not secular as distinguished from religious, but spirtual and godly through and through."

What Minnesota will Ask.

St. Paul Dispatch.

ne victory of Gen. Harrison is the ory of the principle of protection that victory has been made triphant and complete by the loyalty ne northwestern states.

Minnesota in the manner of her avowal of loyalty to republican principles has placed herself in the vanguard. Not all the efforts of concealed mugwumpery protected from view by the dominoe of tariff reform, and not all the wealth and political unscrupulousness of democratic leadership has been effective in swerving the people of Minnesota one hair's breadth from the path which she has trod each successive four years since her admission to the union.

We have one man within the state beloved in private life and worshipped in public, who through good and ill report has held, well to the front, the flag of protection. He is a young man, with the wisdom of a sage and the eloquence of a true orator, who has fought his country's battles as bravely in the field as he has since in the forum. Cushman K. Davis stands alone and peerless among Minnesota republicans.

Mr. Davis is now a senator of the United States from this state. He is a leader in that body by virtue of intellectuallity, and the record which his brief service has enabled him to make, as the defender of the cause of his fellow soldier and as an exponent of republican doctrine, has won for him national recognition.

Every republican is wishing Godspeed to the incoming administration. The popular verdict is but the expression of the general belief that the republican party embodies the bulk of the political wisdom and rectitude of the country. That party has no lease of power beyond four years, and never will have, so long as the American people are free and intelligent. The future fortunes of the party will be made or unmade according to the men whom Gen. Harrison calls around him, and according to the the influences which shall control in his administration of national affairs.

Without reference to Senator Davis' personal wishes, and simply as the humble exponent of republican sentiment in this state, the St. Paul Dispatch gives expression to the belief, that from among the very many men of experience and wisdom in public life that are to be found within the republican party there is none who, either in point of personal fitness or political availability, is better adapted for the office of cabinet adviser of president Harrison than he.

Cabinet-making is not our regular occupation, and newspaper men, notwithstanding the boundless range of their powers, have no special mission to teach statesmanship to statesmen. But the prophecy is a safe one, that in the months immediately preceding his inauguration as president, Gen. Harrison will have ample reason to know that the suggestion here made is neither premature nor ill-considered. Minnesota will speak on this score in such terms as will carry convictions and her voice will wake a sympathetic echo from every state in the west and northwest.

How a New England Farm Pays its Own Bills.

American Agriculturist: It is refreshing to see the farm work which has been done by L. J. Morton, of St. Albans, Vt., on a farm he owns at North Georgia, a few miles from the site of his dry goods business in the latter thriving railroad town. The farm was purchased in a badly rundown and grown-over condition three years ago, and Mr. Morton, who thoroughly believes that farming can made to pay, began operations upon it. He contracted with the Central Vermont railroad to take all the stone he could furnish, and hired it drawn at twenty-five cents per perch. By buying hay the first winter, he succeeded in keeping twenty-five cows. Being within speaking distance of a large creamery, Mr. Morton decided to put on more cows, and this winter will keep seventy-five head with the expenditure of no money, as he has got the farm up to a capacity of one hundred tons of hay, and has built three silos, each fourteen feet square by twenty-three feet deep, at an expense of three hundred dollars, that will contain a large amount of feed. He has erected a barn of three stories, one hundred and fifty feet, slating and handsomely painted it. Here all the manure made can be carefully housed, for Mr. Morton appreciates the value of home made fertilizers and ample fodder stored for feeding. It was predicted when the barn was completed that it would never be filled, but this season shows that the prediction was unwisely made.

The enterprising owner attributes all his success to the saving of manure, and the turning over and thorough stirring up of the soil. What is especially gratifying is the fact that the entire investment pays the owner an annual dividend of four per cent according to accurate accounts kept, and his improvements are now being made from the farm income. Mr. Morton is a thorough business man, and not given to air castle building. This fact, connected with what he has accomplished upon a business basis. The owner has now stopped the investment of accumulated capital and compels the machine to furnish its own fuel.

How to Have Healthy Swine.

Keep large and small separate and not more than ten in a lot.

Feed regularly and liberally a variety of wholesome food, always some bulky food, and let each feed be eaten up clean before more is given.

Give wallowing places, ashes, charcoal and salt, and plenty of exercise in timber pasture yielding shade, roots, nuts, acorns, etc. But no doubly soured slops.

Provide ventilated shelters from wind, rain and snow, but no litter. Hogs with litter get too warm. If you wish disease, put your hogs to the straw pile.

Maintain cleanliness in all things. Breed only mature animals, and never from a show herd. The offspring of immature or pampered animals is predisposed to disease.

Give pure water, deep wells protected from surface water. Well water is not freezing cold in winter nor lukewarm in summer. Water from creeks (unless fed by springs,) ponds or pools, is disease-breeding.

Pigs should be farrowed in early spring and kept on only growing foods —milk, bran slop, oats, green rye, grasses; clover, sweet corn—until late fall; then fatten rapidly, on corn mostly, but also green rye, blue grass, pumpkins, boiled potatoes and turnips with bran, steamed clover hay, etc.

Ayrshire Milk Record.

Hoard's Dairyman.

The following is the report of average yield of milk for eight years ending December 31st, 1887, of the herd owned by C. M. Winslow, Rutland County, Vermont:

The average amount of food for the eight years has been about as follows: Good pasture one and one-half mile from barn. Milking is done in the stable, and they have usually had a feed of from one pint to two quarts of bran at milking time twice a day, but some years it has not been fed. After the evening milking they are turned into a small night pasture. In the winter they have all the good hay they will eat, clean twice a day; they are turned into the yard to drink at about nine o'clock, and, if pleasant and warm, they remain out until about three o'clock, when they have a feed of ensilage, one-fourth of a bushel to a cow, with a grain allowance of from one to eight quarts of bran, with from one pint to two quarts of some heavier feed, according to the need of the different cows. They are kept in a comfortable stable, confined in swinging stanchions and are well bedded with straw. After they are milked at night they are again let out to drink. They have running water from a pond four miles away, brought in iron pipes.

The milk is weighed at each milking and a record kept.

In 1880 the average for 10 cows was 6,035 pounds.
In 1881 the average for 11 cows was 6,176 pounds.
In 1882 the average for 9 cows was 6,672 pounds.
In 1883 the average for 15 cows was 6,169 pounds.
In 1884 the average for 16 cows was 6,814 pounds.
In 1885 the average for 11 cows was 7,025 pounds.
In 1886 the average for 16 cows was 6,833 pounds.
In 1887 the average for 16 cows was 5,782 pounds.

Making an average of 6,865 pounds for eight years from the whole herd of cows and heifers, or an average of 2,860 quarts. This sold at five cents a quart, would make an average of $148 per cow, or if made into cheese, would give 636 pounds per cow; or if made into butter at the rate of 22 pounds of milk to a pound of butter, would give an average of 289 pounds of butter per cow; the 22 pounds is from actual test on an average of the herd.

While these averages are not remarkable for quantity, it should be remembered they are made from the common dairy work of a business herd, and receive no better care than any dairy should, in order to obtain good results.

The Coming Winter.

Toledo Blade:

What kind of a winter will we have after the extraordinarily cool summer of 1888? This is a question of considerable interest just now. Will the low temperature continue, and the winter be proportionately as cool as the summer has been, or will it be warm, so as to maintain the average temperatuae? Ohio has a scientific gentleman who has been in the habit, for a number of years past, of making predictions as to our winters, which he bases on the direction of the storm centers during the month of September. This gentleman is Mr. George H Twiss, of Columbus, and his prediction for the coming winter is as follows—quoted from the monthly report for the Ohio state meteorological bureau, in which it is given:

The coming winter will be in this latitude the coldest for several years. The average temperature in the Northwest, along the upper lake region and New England, will be relative to this locality much warmer than last year. November will be a mild month throughout the country, with heavy rainfalls in the West Central, Middle and Atlantic states. The early part of December will be comparatively mild but from December 20 to 25 the first severe cold wave may be expected, the thermometer dropping to zero in this and possibly in lower latitudes. From December 20 to January 20 cold all over the United States west of the Rocky mountains—marked cold waves near January 5, 15 and 25, and near February 12 and 25. The spring will open early in March attended with freshets. Generally an early spring.

On the other hand, the observers of the United States Signal service look for a warm, open winter. The officer in charge of the signal station in New York city gave his views to a reporter a few days ago as follows:

In my opinion, we are going to have a very mild winter. It may be a long winter, and crowd far into the time when people look for spring weather; but I think it will be mild. Indeed, unless this year is a phenomenal one, it must continue mild during the two months which remain of it. During the past seventeen years the normal temperature has only varied about 4 degrees—between 48 6-10, the minimum, and 52 9-10, the maximum. Now, this year, we are way below, and the balance of the year, must continue warm to bring us up, and I think it will.

Knute Nelson's Speech.

What he Had to Say at the Alexandria Glorification.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 12.—At the celebration Saturday night, Hon. Knute Nelson said:

"We have gained a great victory—a victory so great and so far-reaching that I cannot express the extent of it. Four years ago the solid south, aided by a few northern states, came into power by a mere scratch. The Knights of the Golden Circle, of Indiana, and the draft rioters of New York. The northern copperheads aided the solid south in the victory they gained. To-day the popular feeling is that we must remember what was done four years ago. I believe that Grover Cleveland was honest in his intentions to give a pure administration; but back of Cleveland stands the democratic party, a hungry horde of office-seekers, which brings more pressure to bear upon the president than he can withstand. No man can withstand it. The angel Gabriel himself could not. All we have to do now is to cut Dakota into two states and admit them and Montana and Washington Territory and we can hold the reins of power for the next quarter of a century."

Cleveland's Marc Antony.

Minneapolis Journal: Henry Watterson aspires to be Cleveland's Marc Antony. Hear him. He says; I came to bury Cleveland, not to praise him. The evil men do to their party lives after them, the good is interred with its political hopes. Cleveland was esteemed an honest man, and if it were so it was a grievous fault and grievously hath Cleveland answered it. Here under leave of Dana and the rest, for Dana is an honorable man—so are they all honorable men—I came to speak at Cleveland's funeral. Cleveland was my pupil, teachable and obedient at the last; but Dana said he was a "rattled-brained enthusiast," and Dana is an honorable man. He has filled many offices with democrats, but you all know he was rather slow about it. Did this not become a reformer? When that the hungry democrats have cried Cleveland hath fed them. Is it that a reformer should be made of sterner stuff? Yet Dana says he was no good, and Dana—he's all right. You all did see how at St. Louis we did offer him the crown which he did take though once he did refuse. How was that for high? Yet Dana says he was non compos. I speak not to disprove what Dana says, yet you all did love him at the last and not without cause. He had the bait. What cause withholds you then to mourn for him? O, star eyed goddess of reform, thou art played out and we had better shut up shop. Bear with me; my political hopes are in the coffin there with Grover. And it is a long time between democratic administrations.

D'Autrement's "Canning Factory" Busted!

In his speech in this city a few weeks since, the only mention D'Autrement made of the candidacy of Chas. Canning was: "We have started a Canning factory in the Fifth district." The Canning factory was busted wide open on Tuesday, Nov. 6th, because you neglected the protective plan in your calculations.

Catholic Herald: Hate not. It is not worth while. Your life is not long enough to make it pay to cherish ill will or hard thoughts toward anyone. What if that man has cheated you or that woman played you false?—What if this friend has forsaken you in your time of need or that one having won your utmost confidence, your warmest love, has concluded that he perfers to consider and treat you as a stranger? Let it all pass.—What difference will it make to you in a few years when you go hence to the "undiscovered country?" All who treat you wrong now will be more sorry for it than you even in your deepest disappointment and grief can be. A few more smiles, a few more tears, some pleasure, much pain, a little longer hurrying and worrying in the world, some hasty greeting and abrupt farewells, and life will be over, and the injurer and injured will be laid away and ere long forgotten. It is not worth while to hate each other.

Dairy Problems.

The winter proved to be one that tried farmer's souls and told of what stern materials they were made. Feed was scarce and high priced, and stock would not sell for much more than enough to pay for driving it to market. Farmer Smith thanked his foresight in planting so much corn, and for the equally wise idea of buying a No. 3 Bell City feed cutter which walked right through the corn fodder and paid for itself several times over in the amount of feed it saved, to say nothing of saving labor and bother of hauling out the refuse corn stalks in the spring, besides the saving of exertion for the cows in eating it and their greater liking for it. And for all the drouth, the good farmer had to buy less coare feed than any winter since he had been dairying.

In the fall and early winter a disease made its appearance among the calves that made sad havoc with them and threatened great loss, and not until several had died was a cure discovered. As long as it confined itself to the steer calves Mr. Smith did not tax his brain to discover a remedy; but his wife still persevered in searching for a sure cure. A remedy would seem to be the right cure, when a change of weather would cause a relapse. The greatest difficulty was to correctly locate the disease; guess work so far had failed to give a correct diagnosis.

One morning Farmer Smith came in from the barn and said, "I'll tell you what it is' Lou, we have got to find something that will cure these calves, several of the grade Guernsey and Jersey heifers have a touch of it and I do not want to lose any of them." I, thought you would be waking up to the necessity of the case pretty soon," said his wife; "but there don't seem to be much use in doctoring till you know somewhere near the nature of the disease." Well I have dissected two calves but did not find anything particularly wrong with them."

"But you did not examine the head and it looked to me as if there was the seat of the disease."

"I hardly think it is, for they cough and lose their appetites so soon." For a few days all but two of the calves were improving when Farmer Smith went off on missionary work among the heathen in the rural districts and told his wife to see that the man gave the calves the best of care and gave their medicine regularly, and said "I am afraid one of the Jersey heifers and one steer are past help."

When the good farmer retured his first question was. "How are the calves?" "Well" she answered, "Queenie has gone in search of greener fields and pastures new, "I had a post-mortem held over her remains, with a determination, that if there was a diseased spot in her to find it, and I did and just where I expected to, in the head, between the eyes. Wasn't I mad, when I found out how easy it was to find out what was the matter and that none of them need to have died? I changed the medicine to better suit the case, and they are all gaining nicely, but not quite fast enough, except Buffalo, the storms have given him another relapse and I guess he has decided to seek a more balmy clime. "When Mr. Smith looked the calves over in the morning he found all but one progressing finely and he was in the very last stage of suffering so that he killed him and on disecting him found the same trouble in the head. He said to his wife "I am going to give oil of tar once a day and drop one of the other medicines, and I believe they will gain faster."

"Perhaps they will, and I think they should be smoked with tar smoke, that is for epizootic and this appears to be a specie of it."

"I'll try it, for it won't do any harm anyway," The next day farmer Smith said, "I'll tell you what Lou, two heads are better than one every time. That tar smoke was a happy thought, they are so crazy to hold their heads over it that they will put their noses right down into the fire. It is going to cure them up in a hurry too. This is the most important problem we have yet solved in dairying. It has saved us at least $200 already." The calves were soon all well.

The 18 cows that were being fattened mowed away the feed 'till the poor farmer began to reckon up about how much he was going to be out of pocket on the venture. But he had learned a lesson that he would not forget: that was to fatten stock while they were on grass and in warm weather. About the first of February corn took another upward leap, but cattle did not follow suit, and farmer Smith concluded that now if ever was the time to save himself; so took them to Chicago and counting the butter sold, and allowing a fair price for the manure he came out a little ahead besides the skimmilk and buttermilk, but anything else than milch cows would have come out behind.

About this time farmer Smith concluded to try a new feed. He told his wife that he had bought a load of barley and oats, which with a little wheat bran mixed in he thought would make a very good ration, when she said: "But John, don't you know how much there is said in the farm papers against the use of barley in any form for milch, cows, as it causes abortion?" "Yes I know there is; but you know I don't believe all I read! And I don't believe barley will cause any such trouble.

"I am inclined to think you are right, for I notice that those who have feed flaxseed and cottonseed meal are about the only ones who have any serious trouble with abortion among their cows, and we never had a case before we fed flaxseed meal nor since we quit feeding it. A preparation of cotton seed is the most certain to produce abortion of any medicine known, and flaxseed meal is of the same nature but less powerful, and my philosophy teaches me that a food containing such elements in ignorant hands is apt to bring wholesome food into bad repute by being blamed for its evil deeds." The new feed proved to be better than any yet tried and the cows were fed on it 'till after the cows were turned out to grass, and would have continued feeding it longer had there been any in market.

Land plaster was still used in the barn and Mr. Smith wondered how he had ever got along without it. The greater part of the manure was hauled and spread on to the fields intended for corn as fast as made, so that "winter lingering in the lap of spring" so long did not give the good farmer the olden time worry over the time consumed in hauling manure, and as soon as the plough could be run, plowing was commenced; so that when the long spring rains commenced, the oats were all in and several acres ready for corn and potatoes, which at the first cessation of the rain were planted, and farmer Smith said, "So much for one of the benefits for hauling manure at the right time. "Early in the spring several heifers came into milk, mostly grade Jerseys and some of them were No. 1. The cows were turned on to the winter rye as soon as the snow was off, and the butter soon showed it in its finer flavor and color. And it did one's heart good—especially with hay scarce, and high priced—to see how they enjoyed the fresh feed.

CROOKSTON, MINN., NOVEMBER 8.

Per Cent of Fat in Milk and Cheese.

Ed. Hoard's Dairyman: Further returns from the Experiment Station, and a comparison with the facts made in the cheese factory, show me that I had not the exactly correct data for the statement you were authorized to make last week. I now have to state, that from the reports of the milk that arrived in fairly good testing condition, that there was an average of 3.62 per cent of fat in the April milk, and that it made 9.11 lbs. of well cured cheese to the 100 lbs. of milk. There was one day's test out of ten in which the weight of cheese per 100 pounds of milk did not increase or diminish with the more or less per cent of fat the analysis showed there was in the milk,—an anomolous condition of things I cannot account for—possibly some undetected mistake in weighing. Every other day the cheese responded in weight to the per cent of fat in the milk it was made from.

As many of the days of May, prior to the 9th, that we tested, showed that the milk was poorest in fat than the April milk;—which is accounted for by the fact that the cows had more of the very tender grass, that Prof. Henry says is largely "greeness and water." It contained an average of 3.37 per cent of fat, but still made 9.23 pounds of cheese, as sold, to the hundred pounds. This seeming inconsistency is accounted for by the fact that the first lot was older cheese,—the accumulation of three week's make in one sale, when the patronage was small; and the latter of only 7 days make, and weighed when pretty green. Had they been cured to the same degree of moisture of the April cheese, there would have been only 8⅝ pounds of cured cheese to the hundred pounds—thus showing, again, that per cent of fat in the milk dictates the weight of cheese, when the condition of moisture pertains in uniform per cent. That is, it is true, so far as the tests have been made, and the facts ascertained. At the same time it is conceded that we need hundreds, [and even thousands would be better,] of tests made and facts ascertained, before any one would be authorized to say just how many pounds of cheese a pound of fat in normal milk would make. But that the fat is the closest practical prorator of the money arising from the sale of the cheese, I am more and more confirmed in believing, as I have more and more confidence in the tests that are substantially a duplication of the truths of complete chemical analysis.

I further believe that we are approaching the time when we shall know, by testing the milk when it is very rich in fat, just how much of the fat to abstract and save in the making of standard cheese, and that we shall then have our butter in the churn instead of the whey-vat; and at the same time have cheese that is standard, as shown by the same tests by which milk is tried. In that case I would add the butter and cheese money together before prorating the dividend, and give each patron pay according to per cent of fat put into the milk pool. In short, I would run business by the scale beam, the arithmetic, and honest tests, rather than by guess, and then have the poor dairymen chuckling and the good ones swearing mad—which the latter would be, if they knew as well as I do, how much they were being robbed, and which honest manufacturers are, just now, powerless to stop. There is not a more crying need for anything in the dairy business, than to get the facts of true testing of pooled milk, before the good dairymen of the land. They are the men who must make a move; the poor dairymen and the half dishonest will not call for it—will only submit to it when they must. The facts the experimental station has just made, and now in my possession, show that milk varies from 2.40 to 4.81 per cent in butter-fat, one has double that of the other, and both paid for at the same price per 100 pounds. Further, such facts keep coming. What should be done about it?

J. A. Smith.

[We answer Mr. Smith's last query by saying: keep pounding away at them.—Ed. Dairyman.]

Silo Talk.

Ed. Hoard's Dairyman: Messrs. W. C. Nichols & Son, of Cresco, Iowa, in a recent number of the Dairman ask for information concerning plans for building silos, as they say the Dairyman has given its readers much valuable information on the all important subject of ensilage or a cheaper, better feed.

As I have visited a number of silos, the past winter, I will describe the one that struck me as being the handiest and one of the best I have seen, on a large scale. It belongs to E. B. Fargo, of Lake Mills, Wisconsin, who, though he has been dairying for 25 years, claims that the silo has doubled his farm's capacity. That is, he can now keep 100 cows on the same acres that would formerly keep only 50 or 60. This silo is 22x49 and built as a lean-to on a basement barn. The bottom of the silo is on a level with the floor where the cows stand, and is divided into two pits, built with 2x10 or 12 studding. It is boarded on studding with common lumber, then covered with tar paper, then ceiled with matched flooring inside and sided on outside. As a preservative he intends applying a coat of tar on the inside before he fills again. He put in over 500 tons, last season, and intends to ceil higher on side next to barn, and will put in 600 tons, the coming season. His cutter stands on one side of the barn floor on a platform as high as the rack on his wagons, which saves one man in handling. The carrier runs to center of silo and does not require to be moved, as a tilting board carries it into either pit. Two boxes or funnels, 2x2 feet run from near feeding floor to top of pits, with five small doors about four feet apart opening into same, which are closed as silo is filled and papered over, and opened as the feed lowers, thus dropping it as near where wanted as is possible. His herd of 60 cows have had this feed with bran and one-half bundle of oats to each cow at noon, and no hay through the past winter, and nearly every animal in the herd is fat enough to beef. In fact he sold eight of his lightest milkers for beef, about the middle of April, and they were called the fattest in the car. The top covering I did not see, as about 50 tons remained, May 1st, but any covering that will exclude the air is sufficient. This building has rods across the center to prevent spreading, and cost $525.00 finished and painted.

Will say in addition, that his plan of cutting ensilage, grinding feed, shelling corn etc., is the most economical I have seen, and may serve as a hint to some of the readers of the Dairyman. He makes his butter with a separator and a wire belt runs from engine that does the separating and churning, to the barn and does the work there with but little extra expense for power or for engineer, as the butter maker attends to it. If this throws any light on the matter, I am, yours truly. A. J. Philips.

West Salem, Wis.

The question of building silos most economically and effectually is one of deep interest, for we expect that over 2,000 of the readers of the Dairyman will build silos, the present season. Therefore we hope every one who has a hint to offer will send it in.

Ed. Dairyman.

Hoard's Dairyman: If a man has a "steer dairy" and, through the calamity of blasted crops, has little or nothing to feed them, and has neither money nor credit to buy food to fatten them, we could see why he would feel he had better sell them even at low prices than buy food of any kind. But what a man, in the same fix, with a dairy of good cows, and with any "sand" or sense in him, wants to sacrifice his cows for, passes our comprehension, when nearly all a cow consumes may be grain food without harming her health; and she will pay every day for even that kind of food. Betwixt giving a milch cow her living with grain and a very little forage, and keeping her on high priced hay, the cost would not greatly differ; while the product of butter would favor using the grain food.

LOW RAILROAD FARES.

Canada Excursions.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40,00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th, and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

For through tickets at the lowest rates to all parts of the Continent and full particulars regarding these excursions, call upon or write the nearest ticket agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry., C. H. Mix, agent, Crookston, or to F. I. Whitney, G. P. A., St. Paul. [28-34]

Cheap Excursions to Points East.

The Northern Pacific R. R. announ ce a series of seven special excursions from Grand Forks, Dak., to points in Eastern Canada and return during November and December.

Tickets will be on sale Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and December 3d, 11th and 17th.

The fare will be at the very low rate of $40 for the round trip; tickets are limited to ninety days from date of sale and good for stop over.

With the completion and opening of the new line through to Winnipeg the Northern Pacific R. R. offers the superior accommodations of dining cars and Pullman sleeping cars through on all trains between St. Paul and Winnipeg. We desire to call special attention to these accommodations as they are an entirely new departure to the traveling public of North Dakota. Bear in mind that no other line offers similar inducements, and, notwithstanding the attractions of fast time, through cars, Pullman sleeping cars and magnificent dining cars, via the Northern Pacific, the fare is always as low as via any other route.

For full information regarding routes, rates, etc., apply to the nearest ticket agent of the Northern Pacific R. R. W. E. Germaine, passenger and ticket agent, Grand Forks, H. W. How It Happened.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

Senator Gorman has no doubt about how it happened. "The contest," he says, "was fought out upon the policy laid down by the President in his message and by the action of the democratic majority in the house. The tariff issue was ever present throughout the campaign and it seems as though the republicans have made the country believe that we were committed to free trade, and the people pronounced against it." The senator is right. The people did believe that the democratic party was committed to free trade and had reason to think so. The democratic majorities in some of the manufacturing centers are cited as proof that the tariff was not the issue. The conclusion is not necessary. The democrats spared no pains to satisfy the workingmen of those places that free trade would be a good thing for them and took it for granted that their cries of "tariff reform," and "the tariff is a tax," and "reduction of taxation" would catch the farmers of the West. If they had neglected the manufacturing districts they would probably have held but few of the votes they got there. If the republicans had not paid special attention to the West the farmers would have gotten away from them. The work that was done on the stump and through the press, supplemented by efficient organization, won the fight, and the great issue of the stump speech, the campaign document and political editorial was the tariff. The fisheries affairs, the shams of civil service reform, the "Solid South," the pensions vetoes, the personality of the candidates, and various other things contributed to the result, but the tariff and the fear of a return to "the good old democratic free trade days," when money was scarce and times hard, are not to be under estimated because of a few apparent inconsistencies in the vote of the country.

A Victory that Grows Larger the More It is Considered.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette.

The astonishing victory won by the republicans of the country in last Tuesday's election increases in size and importance the more it is considered. In its sweep it is even greater than the most sanguine republican had dared to hope for. It not only carries the presidential ticket by the electoral votes of all the Blaine states, but the 36 votes of New York, the 15 of Indiana, and the 6 of West Virginia are added also, making a majority for Harrison and Morton of 38 more than are necessary to elect.

The victory also carries the house of representatives by a good working majority. It also gives the republicans two United States Senators from unexpected quarters, and thus places both branches of congress in harmony with the incoming republican administration.

The effect of this great victory will be first felt in the admission of a number of new states. Dakota has been waiting at the door of the Union for admission until her people have become tired of the name of democracy. That territory will probably be soon admitted as two states, and along with them wil probably come Montana, Washington, Idaho and Wyoming, making in all six new states. These would add twelve to the number of senators and 6 to 8 to the number of representatives, and as most, if not all, of these new states will be republican, the republican strength will be greatly increased in both houses of congress, to a degree perhaps beyond the power of the South to disturb it for a great many years.

Nor is this all. In 1890 a new census will be taken, upon which the basis of representation in the house of congress will be fixed for ten years. This will also determine the number of electoral votes for the next presidential election. The greatest growth of the country has been in the North and West, where the bulk of the republican votes are. The new apportionment may therefore be expected to give the republicans a large preponderance of strength in the electoral college, which will make the election of a republican president in 1892 a comparatively easy matter.

There is therefore every reason to believe that this victory of the republican party is one that restores it to power for a long term of years. This, of course, is on the assumption that the party will give the country an able and clean administration and such legislation as will meet every reasonable want of the people. We shall look for the party to carry out its pledges to reform the tariff in the interest of protection to the industries of the country, and to give the people what it has promised to give them, penny postage.

In Painesville, Ohio, over 100 Harrison veterans of 1840 assembled on the day of the election and marched together to the polls, led by a band. They all voted for the old President's grandson.

Care of Milk for Cheese Making.

Written for Hoard's Dairyman. By James W Robertson, Professor of Dairying. Guelph, Ont.

In dairy matters, as in most other affairs, continuous progress is essential to successful practice. The philosophy of successful dairying is like that of picycle riding,—the man who does not keep going on will quietly go off. Thus, in order to maintain our reputation as dairymen, we must improve and increase the quality and quantity of our dairy produce per cow and per acre.

The one aspect of dairy practice that will be presented in this Bulletin, while perhaps less interesting than others that might be treated, is never the less one of vital importance to the persons who have to do with the manufacture of cheese, vis., the preparation and care of milk for cheese-making purposes.

Before the dairyman undertakes to prepare milk for a cheese factory, he should make careful provision for his cows that they should have a chance to yield good wholesome milk. While the products of milk may be easily preserved from speedy decay, it is impossible to reorganize good milk out of that which is inferior in the first place. Hence, I urge upon every dairyman the importance and necessity for keeping only healthy cows. They should receive plenty of nutritious and wholesome feed. The quality of the feed will show itself in the milk and cheese. General experience certainly points to the conclusion that unless we have well-fed cows we cannot have milk of either fine flavor or satisfactory keeping quality.

Cows should have access to pure water only, and that in abundance. We have found a great many farmers careless as to the quality of water which their cows drink. They seem to imagine that if the cows drink anything liquid, the milk will not be in any way affected thereby. I have even known farmers to argue that cows like to drink stuff that is not fit nor good for them. So do some other animals; but the animal is not always the best judge. The superior intelligence of the dairyman is always indicated by the special care he gives to the surroundings of his cows.

I have examined milk under the microscope and found therein microbes that had been taken into the system of the cows through the water which they drank. It is possible to destroy those microbes in the process of cheese-making, but it has not been found possible to impart to such milk the fine flavor it would have possessed had the water been pure. Cheese made from such milk will not keep sound as long as if the cows had drank only pure water. It is not possible to make cheese of fine quality unless the milk used is clean, pure and wholesome.

Another requirement is that the cows should have access to all the salt they care to lick, as often as they like to ake it. It is often said that if cows be allowed to take as much salt as they like they will take too much, and thereby harm themselves. When denied access to salt for some weeks, or even days, they will take too much when a chance is got.

We made a simple experiment in 1886 to define the effect of salt on milk. Eleven cows were divided into four groups, so arranged that the cows of two groups had no access to salt, while those of the other groups had access to all they liked to take. Within two days the cows of the former groups had fallen off in milk 17½ per cent; while the others on the same feed, on the same pasture, and under the same conditions and care, had not fallen off appreciably. After twelve days, a change of the groups was made, one group on and three groups off salt rations, when an almost similar result followed. The yield of the three groups not having salt was reduced on the average 14½ per cent; while the yield of the one groupe with access to salt every day had not been lessened during the test. Each cow of the latter group consumed a quarter of a pound of salt per day.

The effect upon the quality of the milk for cheese making was also shown. It was found that the milk of cows that had no access to salt turned sour in twenty-four hours less time than the milk from cows on the same feed that had daily access to it. I have frequently had occasion to attribute the taint in milk to the fact that no salt had been given to the cows.

The salting of cows as often as once a week is not sufficient. In Ontario we are said to be the most church going and religious people on this continent. That is our reputation. But one practice, performed with religious regularity, is all to prevalent. Many dairymen salt their cows only on Sunday afternoon. That practice is no better for the cows than for the man.

Another essential condition for the production of good milk is that the cows be kept free from all foul odors Many farmers do not understand the delicate sensibility to smells that cows possess. Several years ago a case came under my notice where the milk from a patron owning some twenty-five cows was rejected at the cheese factory. He could not locate nor explain the cause of the trouble. I visited his farm, traveled over his pasture and found in the woods the unburied carcass of a horse which had been hauled there the previous spring. The cows often pastured in the field near by and their milk was positively offensive both to the smell and taste. The carcass was buried at once and no further trouble was experienced with the milk.

It is still desirable to emphasize and impress a knowledge of the need for having all milking animals kept under such conditions of location that the air is practically pure, or free from all contaminating taints.

Foul smells in the stables results sometimes from the generosity of the man who attends to the feeding. He will feed so often and so much that every one of the cows will have indigestion, with all its accompanying disagreeable odors.

If the cow is abused in any way, she inflicts upon her owner the only retiliation she can. She reminds him of his duty to be good and kind to her, by withholding the milk which he requires. For cheese making particularly, the flavor and quality of the milk depends largely upon the disposition of the man who manages the cows.

Trouble is frequently had with inferior milk because the cows had been chased home by "that useless dog." He is more expensive to keep on a dairy farm than a first-class dairy cow. Shoot him this week.

Milk should not be used for cheese making within four days from the date of the calves birth. It should be protected against containation from foul odors that may be adjacent to the place of milking, or which may come through the air. Taint may also be imparted from the vessels used by the milkers, but oftener from their hands. When in Denmark, two years ago, I took some pains to study the methods of an excellent farmer who keeps no less than 250 cows in one stable. One of the regulations of the stable was that every milker should wash his or her hands after milking two cows. The rule was invariable and the butter from that herd brought, at least, ten or twelve shillings per hundred more than the price of ordinary first-class Dutch butter. The owner attributed a large measure of his success to the observation of that one practice.

Having the drawn milk, and the pails being clean—as they generally are since the women folks look after them—the milk should be thoroughly strained. A deal of trouble has arisen from the use of strainer-pails, simply because there is often an accumulation of impurity liable to be hidden from the eyes of the washer. Children have been known to get dangerous attacks of illness from contact with that kind of stuff. The germs it contains can be killed by lactic acid, but prevention is better than cure.

The milk should be strained immediately after milking. Some foulness may have fallen into it and the sooner it is removed the less liklihood is there of its being made soluble in the milk.

After the straining is attended to, the milk should be aerated. Too often it is poured into one large can and left there just as the cows have given it. That neglect implies three things that are very injurious to its quality for cheese making. (1.) The peculiar odor which the cow imparts to the milk will be left in it until it becomes fixed in the flavor. (2.) The germs of fermentation that come in the milk and from the air have the best conditions for growth and action when the milk is left undisturbed. (3.) Then the milk will become almost unfit for thorough coagulation by rennet. Hence it is needful and advantageous to aerate milk for three reasons:

1. By either pouring, stirring or dipping, or by trickling it over an exposed surface of tin we try by evaporation to eliminate from the milk any objectionable volatile element that may be in it.

2. It has already been stated that milk contains germs of fermentation. Some of these we call vibriones. A strange peculiarity about these vibriones is that they become active only in the absence of free oxygen. When warm milk is left undisturbed carbonic gas is generated, and that furnishes the best condition for the commencement of action by these microbes. After they get started they can keep up their decomposing work even in the presence of oxygen. It is impossible to coagulate such milk so as to yield a fine quality of keeping cheese. Coagulation by rennet can never be perfected unless the milk has been thoroughly aerated immediately after it is taken from the cow. Neglect to aeration will increase the number of pounds of milk required for a pound of cheese.

3. The airing seems to give vigor to the germs of fermentation that bring about an acid condition of the milk without producing the acid. So much is this so that it has been found impracticable to make strictly first-class cheese from milk that has not been aerated, or from milk that has not sufficient age before the operation of making is commenced.

The subsequent cooling of milk retards the process by which it is turned sour. A certain kind of germ or fermentation exists in milk, which in the act of multiplying itself splits one molecule of sugar-of-milk into four molecules of lactic acid. Thus by delaying that operation the milk is kept sweet longer. The cooling of the milk should never precede the aeration; it should always follow it. A temperature of from 65 to 70 degrees Fahr. will be found cold enough for the keeping of milk over night.

Moreover the milk requires special protection against any foulness in the air. Everyone has observed that if a pitcher of cold water stand in a warm room, drops of water from the air will immediately begin to condense upon the outside surface. The colder the pitcher and the warmer the air, the greater will be the condensation. In the same way the colder the milk becomes as compared with the temperature of the air, the greater is the condensation from the air on this surface. The cream is very often foul from that cause.

When the whey from a factory is drawn to the farm, a common practice is to empty the can right at the milk stand. Having done that, the owner little thinks of the impurities thereby imparted to the milk, impurities that are certain to get into the cheese.

I have heard of ladies who were so nice in the handling of milk that they objected to send to the factory "the nasty yellow scum" which arises after the milk stands over night; but I never knew a cheese maker in Ontario to complain of receiving an excess of it!

I confidently trust that the good sense and sturdy honesty so characteristic of the farmers and their wives as a class will uphold and aid the efforts of the cheese makers and milk inspectors in trying to stamp out the practice that has been creeping in of late, in the way of taking off cream or keeping back strippings from the milk supplied to factories.

A copy of the Act passed during last session of the Ontario Legislature, relating to that matter is attracted to this Bulletin. The bill was recommended by the Dairymen's Association and was passed under the charge of Mr. Thomas Ballantyne, M. P. P.

At the risk of repeating and for the sake of emphasising what has been already written, the gist of the foregoing suggestion is gathered into 17 short paragraphs.

1. Milk from healthy cows only should be used, and not until at least four days after calving.

2. Any harsh treatment that excites the cow lessons the quantity and injuries the quality of her yield.

3. Cows should be allowed an abundant supply of wholesome, suitable food and as much pure water as they will drink.

4. A supply of salt should be placed where cows have access to it every day.

5. Cows should not be permitted to drink stagnant, impure water, nor to eat cleanings from horse stables, looks, turnip tops, nor anything that would give the milk an offensive taint.

6. All milk vessels should be thoroughly cleaned; first being well washed then scalded with boiling water, and afterwards sufficiently aired to keep them perfectly sweet.

7. Cows should be milked with dry hands and only after the udders have been washed and well brushed.

8. Milking should be done and milk should be kept only where the surrounding air is pure and free from all objectional and tainting odors. Milking in a foul-smelling stable or yard imparts to milk an injurious taint. Sour whey should never be fed, nor should hogs be kept in a milking yard, nor near a milk stand.

9. Tin pails only should be used.

10. All milk should be properly strained immediately after milking, and for that purpose a detached strainer is preferable to a strainer-pail.

11. In preparing milk for delivery to a cheese factory it should immediately after straining be thoroughly aired by pouring, dipping or stirring. This treatment is as beneficial for the morning's milk as for the evening's, and is even more necessary when the weather is cool than when it is warm.

12. In warm weather all milk should be cooled after it has been aired, but not before.

13. Milk kept over night in small quantities—say in tin pails—will be in better condition than if kept in larger quantity in one vessel.

14. When both messes of milk are conveyed to the factory in one can, the mixing of the morning with the evening's milk should be delayed till the milk wagon reaches the stand.

15. While the, milk is warmer than the surrounding air it should be left uncovered, but when colder it may with advantage be covered.

16. Milk pails and cans should be protected from the rain, and milk stands should be constructed to shade the cans from the sun.

17. Only honest milk with its full share of strippings should be offered; violation of this requirement leaves the patron liable to a heavy penalty.

So far as the Dairy department here can further help dairymen in the direction of making their business more profitable it will freely and cheerfully give information to all who apply by letter or otherwise.

Northamton (Mass.) Gazette: The mugwump papers still continue to advise the republican party what to do. Their awful warnings in the past have not produced much impression, and what they may say hereafter will not be greatly heeded. The mugwump editor is in a bad way. The republicans do not care to read what he says, and the democrats wish he would shut up, as he does them more harm than good.

The Pembina Pioneer gives an account of the death of Mr. Abrahams, who was in the employ of the company on its Fosston line until recently. Rev. S. Currie called at THE JOURNAL sanctum on Tuesday evening to report progress with the Jersey herd. He is now milking 25 cows and making 75 lbs. of butter a week. Most of these cows are nearly dried off and will milk but a short time. He will have a herd of 35 cows next summer; will have enough new milch cows this coming winter to keep up a good supply of butter. Mr. C. is a great believer in a good dairy cow as a valuable adjunct to the farm, and a firm believer in the little Jersey as the best butter-maker. He pins his faith to the Jersey with plenty of feed for her. With this combination he says there is no reason why farmers in this country should complain of hard times. While he has great faith in the Jersey, he does not decry the merits of any good dairy breed, but believes there is ample room for them all. He says his experience proves that we can make more money in stock in this country than can be made upon the high priced lands of the east.

On Saturday night as a Frenchman, whose name we could not learn, was going over to Carman, he heard groans as of some one in distress. Going toward the railroad he found a woman lying at the foot of the grade apparently in great distress. He at once informed the police who proceeded to the spot and conveyed the woman to the Canada House and called Dr. Denniston, who ascertained that no bones were broken. The woman is evidently a Norwegian and says that her home is in Marshall County, that she had been to Dakota in search of work and failing to obtain it, came back to Crookston where she had intended to stop off, on Saturday night's train. How she got off the train she does not seem to remember. Some of the passengers say she left her seat hurriedly and going to the door jumped off while the train was going at full speed. The distance from the track down to where she was found is fully 20 feet, and the wonder is that she was not instantly killed. It is the impression of those who seeing that she is decidedly out of her mind at present and that may account for her mishap.

O. L. Larson was down from Fosston on Monday trying to find consolation in his recent defeat for the legislature. The Fosston Thirteen Towns says the company will lay 8,000 miles of sidetrack there (or was it 8,000 FEET?) which would make room for several cars if needed. Well whether it was feet or miles the fact remains that Fosston will enjoy her road for which she has waited so long.

C. J. McCollom was down from Hallock on Saturday evening to attend the ratification meeting and help us celebrate the great victory. He says that Kittson County did herself proud in the election. He says that the late change on the road does a great injustice to the people along the line and a great deal of murmuring is heard. The idea of a 6 hour run from Crookston to Hallock—a distance of 71 miles is preposterous.

I can promise my friends and customers a surprise when they inspect my establishment and see the limitless array of new and handsome goods I can show them. C. H. SAAKE,

Engineer Fred Chapin complains that one of the Grand Forks papers did him an act of injustice when it said that he was not ringing the bell at the time of the accident at the Fourth St., crossing. He says that he never passed a street yet without ringing his bell and was doing so then, approaching very slowly. When within a car-length of the crossing he saw the man coming with his horses on the gallop. He then signalled for brakes, and did all in his power to stop. The Norwegian, also tried to stop his team and did succeed in checking them considerably, enough so that the pilot struck the outfit between the team and the wagon, pitching the team one way and the wagon the other. The old man and the old woman were thrown upon the cowcatcher and carried some distance before they fell off. The man was seriously injured but will probably recover. The woman was obliged to suffer amputation of one leg and will probably die. Both were over 60 years of age. Fred feels the sad affair keenly and thinks it is hard enough to bear without being misrepresented.

The Grand Ratification.

Owing to the extreme cold weather on Saturday night but comparatively few people attended the grand rally from outside the city, yet the streets were full. The Argyle, Warren and Crookston bands furnished excellent music, and considering the weather, the parade was a big one. The barbecue and the speeches were enjoyed by all who were brave enough to stay out very long. About 200 came on the St. Vincent extra.

The announcement of the appearance of this able actor in the character of "Shaun Rhue," in the Irish comedy of that name, filled the Opera Huse to its utmost capacty last night. It is a rousing good piece, laughter provoking, vivacious and full of repartee. It is useless to add that Mr. Murphy was good; in the delineation of Irish character he is inimitable, and as a vocalist he possesses great power and feeling. Mr, Murphy was well supported, especially so by the gentlemen who took the part of "Donovan" and the "Dominie."

Death of Mrs. How.

Barnesville Review: The sudden death of Mrs. T. M. How, which occurred in Minneapolis, on Tuesday: Nov. 13th, at the reridence of Dr. Manville C. Keith, has cast a gloom over the entire town. Mrs. How was universally respected and loved by all who knew her, for her kind and amiable disposition. In her character was developed all that make the true christian lady. Mr. How and her relations have the sincere sympathy of all their friends in this place. Mrs. How was a native of Perth County, Ontario; married at Stratford and moved to Ontario in 1882, and to Barnesville in 1886, where they have since resided. The funeral occurred on Friday and the interment at Barnesville cemetery. Rev. R. A. Sanderson conducted the burial service in a most impressibe manner; his address was full of comfort and solace for the afflicted ones, whose irreparable loss can only be partially healed by the laps e of time.

A Citizens' League.

(Communicated.)

Pursuant to an announcement made at the union meeting last Sunday evening, a large number of our prominent citizens met on Tuesday evening at the Reading Room and organized themselves into a "Citizens' League." The object of the League is to enforce our laws which, especially in regard to the liquor traffic, have been flagrantly violated. The League is well equipped for work and let us hope that through its efforts much may be done in the interest of public morality and virtue in our city. X.

The thanks of THE JOURNAL are due to McCollom & Suffel for a full-blown thoroughbred sage cheese which found its way to this office from their cheese factory on Saturday last. This factory is getting a much deserved reputation for the quality of its goods which finds ready sale everywhere in the Northwest. The firm has worked under many disadvantages with everything to discourage their efforts but have persistently stuck to it with the only result so far that the farmers have had a good thing out of it, but the reputation the factory is building up for good goods will no doubt make the enterprise a paying one for its energetic founders. The farmers in that vicinity owe it to themselves to see that every possible encouragement is given to their factory to make it a success. They should take pains to obtain the very best cows for the purpose and feed them properly to the end that the best results may be obtained. Every farmer is personally interested in the success of that factory and upon their intelligent efforts is that success almost wholly dependent. The very best talent in the world cannat produce the best cheese unless that alent is seconded by the efforts of the milk producer. That this fact seems to be too little appreciated is witnessed by the many failures of cheese factories and creameries that we have witnessed every year. No farmer should forget that it requires feed to produce good, rich milk and that it also requires cows of a dairy breed to pay for the feed used. Beef cows use the feed given them to produce beef and pay for in that way; the dairy cow, having been for years bred into the dairy habit use their feed to produce abundance of rich milk giving ample returns in cheese and butter while the scrub, having no fixed habits at all, seems to consume its food merely for the fun of eating, giving no adequate returns therefor either in milk or beef. This one reason why you see so many farmers in this country who will tell you that there is no money in stock and another reason is that some expect a scrub cow, without any feed at all except a poor pasture to pay as large a dividend as a thoroughbred milch cow on full feed. This never has been accomplished yet and the probability is that it never will for it has been faithfully tried from time immemorial and always without success.

MOVEMENTS OF SATAN

The Devil Credited With Vast Power, Whose Malign Influence Must be Repulsed by Every One.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 11: At the Tabernacle this morning the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., took for the subject of his sermon: "Satan on His Travels." His text was, Job 1. 7.

And the Lord said unto Satan: Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said: From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

In 1672 was printed the largest book ever published, namely, two huge volumes of near 2,000 pages in small type, the author Joseph Caryl. It was a commentary on this Book of Job. When it took a year for the journey from England to India, the son of the author of this commentary started for India, leaving his father writing on his book, and was gone for years, and when he came back to England still found his father writing on it: I never saw the commentary, but I do not wonder at its size because there is no end to the enterest of the Book of Job. I am not surprised that Goethe, the unbeliever, took from this wonderful book the opening of his drama "Faust," and the Mephistopheles of the great German was only the Satan of Job. It seems that one day in heaven God was on His throne and angels and messengers came to report on their different missions. I suppose one angel said: "I was out among the stars and I saw one of them burn down." Another angel, I imagine, said: "I was off on a stellar excursion and was present at the birth of a new world." Another angel, I think, said: "I was journeying five hundred million miles in the wilderness of immensity and I saw a meteor run down a planet." Another angel: "I was off and helped at the inauguration of a new race of beings the amid the mountains and valleys of that mighty world in the southeast part of the heavens." But while these great and good spirits were making their reports a ghastly grizzly, hideous monster from some miry sulphurous, filthy world, came into the palace without wiping his feet, and God asked him where and how he had been occupying himself, and this greatest scoundrel of the universe made reply with brazen effrontery, and instead of acknowledging any of the mischief he had been doing said he had been an earthly pedestrian and had lived a sort of circumambulatory peripatetic life. "And the Lord said unto Satan: Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord: From going to and fro in the earth and from walking up and down in it."

This monster of my text has a great variety of names. You know that notorious villains are apt to take a variety of names. Arraigned in Paris for burglary a man will give one name; arrested in San Francisco for arson he will give another name, imprisoned in Montreal for murder he will give another name. So this creature of my text has many names. He is called in sacred and profane literature Abaddon, Apollyon, Ahrimanes, Zeniel, Asmodeus, the revenging devil, Beelzebub the sovereign of devils. Lucifer the brilliant devil, Diabolus the despairing devil, Mammon the money devil, Pluto the fiery devil, Baal the military devil, Meresin the plaguing devil. He is called the father of lies and has for his children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren all falsehoods, deceptions, frauds, swindles, slanders, backbitings and subterfuges. All men of good sense, whether enlightened by the Bible or in heathendom, have noticed that there are baleful and maleficient influences abroad that have not their origin in the human race, and demonology is as certain as angelology. The sword of Paracelsus was thought to have had a demon in the hilt and there is now a demon in every sword hilt. The ancients supposed the air was filled with sylphs and satyrs and sirens and gnomes and vampires and salamanders and undines and hobgoblins. The Talmud says that Adam's first wife was Lillis and that their children were all devils. Two or three hundred years ago a demonographer gave the names of ambassadors of evil, which he thought Satan sent to different countries: Mammon, ambassador to England; Belphegor, ambassador to France; Mantinet, ambassador to Switzerland; Rimon, ambassador to Russia; Thanniz, ambassador to Spain; Hutgin, ambassador to Italy and that there was a princess of devils by the name of Proserpine. But what was mere guess work of mythology or superstition has been made clear by divine revelation. We find that there is somewhere a monarch of all wickedness. He has a throne of power and courtiers and armies and navies and machinery of evil vast as the round world. He is the supervisor of all mischief and what he cannot do himself he delegates others to do, and as each one of our race is supposed to have a guardian good angel, I have no doubt that every human being has a besieging malignant spirit nagging his footsteps and trying to make him think wrong and act wrong, an especial devil, a devil of fraud or a devil of avarice or a devil or uncleanliness of a devil of poor health, and as in my text the spirits are represented as reporting to the Lord so I have no doubt the evil spirits report to Satan, who is the enemy of the whole human race, and who has celerity that makes flight around the world the matter of a second, and who marshals on his side the forces volcanic, atmospheric, epidemic, geologic, oceanic and cyclonic. "And the Lord said unto Satan: Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said: From going to and fro in the earth and from walking up and down in it,"

Satan began his attack on this world long before Adam and Eve were created. While I believe the Bible record that the world was fitted up for man's residence in one week, I believe also the geological record that the world was previously for hundreds of thousands of years going through great changes. The timber for the house that was to be built for our first parents may have been hauled to the spot a million years before. This prince of the power of the air has been trying for all that million years to demolish and use up this world. The record is on the rocks. He tried to drown it with universal waters. He tried to burn it with universal fires. Then he tried to freeze it into ruin, and covered it with universal glacier. And for ages he kept this world before our first parents occupied it in paroxysms and convulsions, and the remains of those struggles I have seen, and you have seen in museums, or if with geologist's hammer you have gone down into the stone libraries of the mountains. Yea, after the famous Bible week the world has been fitted into a paradise for the home of our sinless ancestors.

Satan comes into the Garden of Eden, not through the gate of foliage and upright in posture, but crawls in under the bushes a snake, and, having despoiled our first parents, goes to work to ruin paradise, and does the work so thoroughly that one who recently visited the site of the ancient garden between the Rivers Tigris and Euphrates says the place is a desert, not a flower, and the ground so poor that nothing but some date trees grow there, and the miserable villagers from near by are not so well covered up with their rags as Adam and Eve were covered up with their innocence. So you see the father of lies for once told the truth when the Lord said unto him: "Whence comest thou?" and Satan answered the Lord and said: "From going to and fro in the earth and from walking up and down in it.

In my text we have Satan on his travels, and I am going to tell you some of the routes he is apt to take. On his way down from the palace where he reported himself in answer to the question: Whence Comest thou? the first range of mischief he may be expected to take is the air. It was not a witticism or a slip of the pen when Paul in his letter to the Ephesians called Satan the "Prince of the Power of the air." I think it means that Satan works through conditions of the atmosphere. The west wind is full of angels, the east wind is full of devils. Satan spreads abroad his black wings and hurricanes and euroclydons and Caribbean whirlwinds and equinoctials are hatched out. He takes the miasmas that float up from swamps and hatches them into typhoid fevers. He takes the cold blasts and hatches them into pneumonias and rheumatisms and consumptions. Not only has he power in the upper air where highest clouds float, but power over the lower air which we breathe, and as we breathe 19 times a minute, and take 350 cubic feet of air in every 24 hours, and much of this air affects the arterial circulation, you see what opportunities the prince of the air has of contaminating and despoiling and demoralizing a man. Through atmospheric influences he clouds the dispositions and rasps the nerves and covers the best of people with religious despondency, as in the case of Edward Payson and William Cowper, and that beloved apostle of evangelism, James W. Alexander. His great delight is to have the air of churches vitiated and in that way dulls the preacher and stupefies the people and sees to it that the atmosphere of not more than one out of a hundred churches is fit to breathe, and whole congregations Sabbath by Sabbath are asphyxiated. Yes, he is worthy of the title St. Paul gave him: "Prince of the Power of the Air."

Another route he is apt to take is through domestic life. There is no greater sport for him than conjugal quarrel. It does not make any difference how long the marriage ring has been on the finger of the right hand, he will try to pull off the signet. He says to the husband: "What a plain wife you have compared with what she once was. Don't you see that the color has gone out of her cheek and there are several wrinkles about her temples and a sprinkling of frost on her locks? Besides that, you have advanced in intelligence while she has stood still or gone back. How hard it is that you should be chained to such dullness and imbecility!" Then he turns and says to the wife: "That man neglects you, you have a right to be jealous. He likes his cigar and his club and anything and everything better than you. Why not get a divorce? Marriage is only a civil contract anyhow, and not a divine alliance. Let me have that ring. It means nothing and you might as well give it to me." The ring is handed over to Satan and he tosses it up and down like a plaything over the mouth of perdition and says, "I will hand it back, only let me have it a little while." And he keeps tossing that ring with all its sacred memories higher up and farther out, tossing and catching it until one day you clutch for it, crying, "Give back my ring!" but lo, it has dropped into the yawning gulf and you suddenly find who has been pitching and catching the ring, and cry out, "Whence comest thou?" and he answers, "From going to and fro in the domestic life of the city and from walking up and down in it: that is all." There are thousands of marriage relations strained almost to breaking, and I commend to all men and women who are restless in the present marriage state that they resume the old-time courtship and take as much pains to make themselves agreeable as they did five or ten or twenty years ago, before the wedding march announced to the flushed and fluttering crowd that the bride and groom were coming. According to the statistics of Prof. Dikes, in one year in moral New Hampshire there were 241 divorces; in temperate Maine, 478 divorces; in good old Massachusetts, 600 divorces, and in the New England of "steady habits," 2,113. In one county of Illinois 830 divorce suits were begun in one year, and in many places it seems as if a new arrangement had been made of the commandments, and instead of 10 there were only nine, the seventh commandment having been left out. When you see how many husbands and wives are parted by law, and know of so many who would like to dissolve conjugal partnership, do you not come to the conclusion that Satan is engaged in mighty industries?

Another route that Satan is apt to take in his active travels is the factories and other establishments where capital sits in the office or counting room and a good many hands of laborers are busy among wheels and spindles and fabrics. On this visit he will first step into the manufacturer's office, and finding the owner and proprietor of the great establishment all alone with his correspondence and his account book, says to him: "You are not making as much money as you ought. You furnish all the brains. Were it not for your enterprise this establishment would not be in existence. These men and women in your employ are of very common mould. Their appetite is coarser, and they do not need the luxuries you require. Their comfort and happiness are of very little importance. Put them down on the very verge of starvation and take all the profits into your own possession, and if they do not like it; tell them to go where they can do better." Having done his work in the counting room, Satan steps right out among the workmen. He says: "You work too many hours, and you do your work better than it needs to be done: You are serving a bloated bondholders anyhow. He has no right to have any more than you have. Why should he have tenderloin steak and you salt pork? Capital is the enemy of labor. Let labor be the sworn foe of capital. Why don't you strike and bring him to terms? Wait until he has a large order to fill by contract and then he cannot help himself. Go all together, without a moment's warning, and tell him you are going to stop. If he has more resources than you know of and persists in going on and getting new men, give them a volley of brickbats or put a little dynamite in his office and blow him and his factory all up with the same explosion." Look out there on the night sky! Great fire somewhere. What is it? The night is cold and Satan has made a big bonfire of that factory to warm himself by. The capitalist has lost heavily and the workmen and their families are without bread and clothing. "Whence comest thou, Satan?" "From going to and fro among employers and employes and from walking up and down among them. Ha! Ha! I was the only one who made anything out of that strike. What a splendid fire and lots of smoke! Ha! Ha! I like smoke."

Another route Satan is apt to take in his travels is through the mercantile establishments. He steps in and says to the clerks: "How much salary do you get? Is that all? Why you can't live on that! You have a right to enough for a livelihood. A few quarters out of the money drawers will never be missed, or here and there is a remnant of goods you could take home without being found out. Or you could change those account books a little and you could make that figure eight a naught and that figure five a three and if you do not feel exactly right about doing that you can some day pay it back, which you can do perfectly easy. Don't feel like running the risk? Well, then you can't go to the theatre and you can't go on that round with the boys and you will have to wear that plain coat whereas you could have your overcoat fur lined, and take board at a tiptop place and walk amid plush and tapestries positively oriental. While you are making up your mind I will just go through the different parts of his great commercial establishment and try every one from the wealthy firm down to the errand boys." The result of that Satanic visit is that one of the partners has drawn so much out of the concern that the whole business is crippled and a bright and promising boy is sent home to his mother in disgrace and a young man is in jail for embezzlement. Three lives ruined and three eternities. Whence comest thou, Satan? "From going to and fro among mercantile houses and from walking up and down among them. I like to ruin splendid fellows and blast parental hopes, and of all the liquors that I ever tasted fill my glass with a brewing of agonizing tears. Come! let us click together the rims of our glasses and drink to the overthrow of the 50,000 young men I ruined last year! Huzza!" Satan would rather have one young man than 20 old ones. If he would win the septuagenarians and the octogenarians he could do but little harm with them. But he says: "Give me a young man, especially if he be bright and generous and social." He sees that young men have for good or bad been the mightiest influence in this world. Hernando Cortez conquered Mexico at 32. Gustavus Adolphus became immortal in history so early that he died at 38. Raphael, the most famous of painters, died at 37. William Pitt was prime minister of England at 24. Jesus Christ completed his earthly life at 33. Five years in a young man's life are of more power for good or evil than the last 15 of an old man's life. So Satan is especially greedy for young men, and in going to and fro in the earth he has especial temptation for them.

Another route that satan on his active travels is apt to take is for the despoiling of the people's souls. It does not pay him merely to destroy the bodies of men and women. Those bodies would soon be gone anyhow, but great treasures are involved in this Satanic excursion. On this route he meets a man who is aroused by something he has seen in the Bible, and Satan says: "Now, I can settle that; the Bible is an impositon; it has been deluding the world for centuries: do not let it delude you. It has no more authority than the Koran of the Mohammedan or the Shaster of the Hindoo, or the Zend Vocsta of the Persian!" He meets another man who is hastening towards the kingdom of God and says: "Why all this precipitation? Religion is right, but any time within the next 10 years will be soon enough for you. A man with a stout chest like yours and such muscular development need not be bothering himself about the next world." But Satan says nothing to him about the fact that the professor who gave his whole life to the study of health and could lift more pounds than any American died at about 40, and that another learned man who proved conclusively that if we observed all the laws of health we need never die, expired before he got his book on that subject published. Satan meets another man who has gone through a long course of profligacy and is beginning to pray God for forgiveness, and Satan says to the man: "You are too late; the lord will not help such a wretch as you, you might as well brace up and fight your own way through." And so with a spite and an acuteness and a velocity that have been gaining for 6,000 years, he ranges up and down, baffling, disappointing, defeating, afflicting, destroying the human race. Through his own hand or delegated infernalism he has pursued and hurt us all, and cursed every heart and cursed every home and cursed every nation and cursed every continent. He has instigated every war. He has started every groan. He has pressed out every sigh. He has hurled every shipwreck, Lazar ettoes, insane asylums, commercial panics, plagues, destroying angels, continental earthquakes, and world-wide disasters are to him a perfect glee. Can you look upon the communism and the Mormonism and the Mohammedanism and the wide sweep of drunkenness and fraud and libertinism, the Franco-German war and Crimean war, the North and South United States war, and rivers of blood flowing across continents of misery into oceans of wretchedness, without realizing the power of the evil one, who reported to the Lord Almighty, and when asked, "Whence comest thou?" answered, "From going to and fro in the earth and from going up and down in it."

But, blessed be God! I may substitute anthem for requium and hallelujah chorus for the dead march in Saul. The New Testament says, "The Son of God was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil." It prophesied that an angel would come down from heaven with the key and chain and incarcerate and shut up the old dragon. It says that Christ came to "destroy him that had the power of death—that is the devil." And from the way Christ drove the devil out of those possessed by him until he was glad to hide under the bristles of the swine of Gadara and from other violent ejectments, we know that there is in existence a power a million-fold mightier than the diabolic. The old lion of death shall go down under the stroke and roar of the "Lion of Judah's tribe." Yea, my text shows that Satan was compelled to report to the Almighty and give account of himself. When God said to him, "Whence comest thou?" he was forced to answer. What means that scripture which says that Christ shall bruise the serpent's head? If you have ever killed a snake the passage ought to be plain to you. You see this old serpent, the devil, has crawled across the nations, poisoning whole generations and leaving its trail on everything; but after a while it will be cornered, and hissing and writhing in rage and with crest lifted and forked tongue shot out it will make a final attack on Christ, and Christ will advance upon it, and lifting up his omnipotent foot, that foot strong enough to crush a world, lifting that foot right over the head of the reptile, will put down his heel with a crushing power that shall leave the monster bleeding and mashed, never to hiss again or bite again, or shake his old rattle again. Thank God he has already received a stunning blow. Hear you not the rumbling of the Christian printing presses, and the whirling of the gospel chariot wheel? As many souls have been added to the Christain church in the last 80 years as in the previous 18 centuries, and that is a ratio of increase acclamatory with gladness. The kingdom is coming, and I am so sure of it that I do not propose to fret and worry because it has not already come. I may jump to get on a boat that is going off, but I do not propose to jump for a boat that is coming in. The sharp attacks of infidelity and sin are a good sign that especial blessing is coming in showers over all the earth. Flies bite sharp just before rain.

If we do not see the full consummation our children will see it. In the time of the French Revolution a great procession of boys carried through the street a banner with the inscription, "Tremble, tyrants; we shall grow up!" Though we may fail to do our duty there is a rising generation being gospelized and coming by the hundreds of thousands from our Sabbath schools and Christian homes who might properly have on their banners, "Tremble, ye powers of darkness and sin; for we are growing up!" We may not amount to much in ourselves, but if we put ourselves in the right place we can do great exploits. Two put under two make only four; but placed beside two make 22. Yet what you and I most need is power to drive back this Apollyon, this Asmodeus, this Ahrimades our hearts and lives. And we can do it not by our own strength but by divine power afforded, for here is a passage emblazoned with encouragement which says: "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." Remember it is no sin at all to be tempted. The best and the mightiest have been tempted. Milton describes a toad squat at the ear of Eve. The sin is in surrendering. Do not feel so secure in yourself as to think you cannot be overthrown. How do you account for the fact that there are so many old men in Sing Sing and Auburn and the other penitentiaries serving out their protracted sentences for frauds committed in mid-life or advanced ages, although their early life had been good, and nothing had been suspected of them until at 50 or 60 years of age the whole land was struck dumb at their forgery or embezzlement. The clock in the steeple of old Trinity Church striking the hours did not remind the recreant Wall-streeter of the passage of time that would soon bring exposure to and doom. The explanation is that Mephistopheles, Apollyon, Satan got in his work at that time. The man was not naturally bad. He was as good as any of you are, but Satan with whole battalions of infernals swooped upon him unawares. Look out for the wiles of the devils, not only those of you who are young, but the middle-aged and the Old outside of God you are not safe a moment. But yield not to disheartenment. If we put our trust in God our best days are yet to come—days of victory, days of song, days of heaven, and the best days of the cause of righteousness in all the earth are yet to come. As the 10,000 men of Xenophon's army when they came to the top of Mount Theches and saw the waters on which they were to sail to their homes, the soldiers with clapping hands and waving banners all together shouted: "The sea, the sea!" So we today, in our march toward our heavenly home, come up to the top of the mountain of holy anticipation and look off upon oceans of light and oceans of glory and oceans of joy; and thrilled as we have never been thrilled before we clap our hands and wave our gospel ensigns and cry one to another and shout up to the responding and re-echoing heavens: "The sea, the sea!"

The Old-Fashioned Girl.

She was a little girl until she was fifteen years old, and she helped her mother in her household duties. She had her hours to play, and enjoyed herself to the fullest extent. She never said to her mother, "I don't wantto," for obedience was to her a cherished virtue. She arose in the morning when called, and we do not suppose she had her hair done up in curl papers and crimping pins, or banged over her forehead. She did not grow into a young lady and talk about her beau before she was in her teens, and she did not read dime novels, nor was she fancying a hero in every boy she met. The old-fashioned girl was modest in her demeanor, and she never talked slang nor used by-words. She did not laugh at old people nor make fun of cripples. She had respect for her elders, and was not above listening to counsel from those older than herself. She did not konw as much as her mother nor did she think that her judgement was as good as that of her grandmother. She did not go to parties by the time she was ten years old and stay till after mid night, dancing with chance young men who happened to be present. She went to bed in season, and doubtless she said her prayers and slept the sleep of innocence, rose up in the morning happy and capable of giving happiness. And now, if there is an old-fashioned girl in the world to-day, may heaven bless and keep her and raise up others like her.—Bishop Cosgrove.

MINNESOTA RETURNS.

The returns in Minnesota on president congressmen and governor are nearly complete. In several counties the judges of election sealed up the vote and sent them in without any note of the vote cast being given and only the official canvass will give the exact figures. From those counties where official returns have not been received estimates have been made. In other counties only the pluralities have been received and they are given, designated by an asterick. Harrison's plurality over Cleveland is 33,017, and Merriam 24,827 ahead of Wilson. Official figures will probably increase these pluralities slightly, but very little changes will be made.

Wheat from Seed 5,000 Years Old.

A most interesting experiment culminated in the raising of some wheat as old as the exodus. The experimenter is David Drew, who last year received from a friend in Alexandria, Egypt, some grains of wheat taken from a mummy exhumed near the ruins of Memphis, and belonging, it is believed, to the period of the ninth dynasty, which would make it grown about three thousand years B. C., or nearly five thousand years old. He planted the seed early in the spring and carefully nursed it. It grew rapidly and at the time of cutting measured from six and a half to seven feet high. The leaves alternate on the stalk like common wheat, but the product of the plant is the most singular part of it, for, instead of growing in an ear like modern corn, there is a heavy cluster of small twigs in place of the spindle, which hangs downward from its weight, and each twig is thickly studded with kernnels, each of which is in a separate husk. From what is threshed a larger crop will be grown next year, as the result proves this to exceed in quality anything modern grain can grow.—Cincinnatti Enquirer.

"Setting Them Up" for Bruin.

A Lamoreau of East Windham one day took the strap from the neck of his large black bear and let it loose in an enclosure during winter. When summer came Lamoreau desired to put the strap around Bruin's neck, again, but found it a difficult matter to accomplish. Finally the bear was given whisky. After drinking nearly a gallon Bruin "acted like a man," and while helplessly drunk the strap was placed around its neck. The next morning the bear "had a head on him" and was generally "out of sorts."—Kingston Freeman.

MINNESOTA IN BRIEF.

Joseph Busch, an old resident of Grey Cloud, died at the age of 103 years.

The Winona and Southwestern Improvement company has incorporated with a capital stock of $200,000.

A man giving the name of Williams stole a wagon load of flax, brought it to Pipestone and sold it for $51. He left for parts unknown.

Foster, the Fair Haven man who was scalded by his wife some weeks ago when he came home drunk, died suddenly. Poisoning is suspected.

A Swede painter, named Ghujson, fell from the Y. M. C. A. building at Brainerd and was probably fatally injured.

Burglars entered the store of H. Z. Mitchell of St. Cloud and stole about $200 worth of cloth, overcoats and all the jewelry in the cases.

Interest is increasing in the chicken business at Winona. A number of new and expensive poultry houses have been built there this season, some of them costing as high as $300.

A blaze in the grocery of J. S. Mathewson at Rochester, damaged the stock about $500, and filled Cook's hotel with smoke, creating much consternation among the guests in the hotel. The cause of the fire is unknown.

Warren Gill, of Red Wing, was instantly killed while riding on a carload of ties attached to the switch engine. The car left the track, and he jumped to save himself, when the tie, fell on to him, crushing his head and chest completely.

Grading on the twenty-five miles of the Duluth road between Red Wing and Zumbrota is now nearly completed. Tracklaying will commence at once and will be completed in a very short time. It is expected to have trains running by December 1.

On his farm a few miles South of Brainerd John Webber, a young German farmer, committed suicide by taking laudanum. He had been disipating previous to the election, and had bet some on Cleveland's election. He had a family and had been quite well-to-do as a logger.

Ole Oleson, an old resident at Winona, met with a serious accident while handling the cannon used in the Republican ratification. The cannon went off prematurely while Olsen was ramming it, the volley tearing off both of Olsen's hand's. He is lying in a critical condition.

A new saw mill with a capacity of 100,000 feet daily, will be erected at Little Falls by C. E. Bridgman, of Sauk Center. This adds another to the many flourishing of that growing city. Hundreds of workmen are already employed in erecting the two new flouring mills, and the prospect is bright for a brilliant future for Little Falls.

W. F. Howard, a prosperous young farmer living near Mazeppas has left for parts unknown, leaving his creditors in the lurch for over $3,000. It is estimated that he carried away about $4,000 which he borrowed. He leaves a wife and three children, and his wife claims that he has gone to meet a pretty cousin with whom he is greatly infatuated.

The dedication of the new Bohemian Catholic church took place at Winona, with a grand parade which was participated in by all the Catholic organizations of Winona and many from La Crosse. Father Byzewski, of the Polish church, had charge of the ceremonies and preached a sermon in Polish. Father Cotter spoke in English, Father Meier in German and Father Mikula in Bohemian.

The November term of court, which Judge Weber has opened at Redwood Falls, excites an unusual degree of interest, as there will be two murder cases to be disposed of. The case against John Gorres, indicted for murder of John Rosencranz in the town of Willow Lake last April, was continued from last term. The case of William Rose, charged with the murder of Moses L. Lufkin, in the town of Gales last August, will be presented before the grand jury for its action. Both cases rest to a great extent on circumstantial evidence, and the prisoners will make a vigorous defense through able counsel when they come to trial.

A Barrel of Flour Made Into Bread

The American Analyst thus sums a baker's profits, or what a barrel o. flour is worth when made into breadf A baker will toss a barrel of flour into a trough. Then he tosses 104 pounds of water on top. A quantity of yeast is added, and then the jolly baker has 300 pounds of dough to operate on. The 300 pounds cost him $5. In short order the dough is turned into "twists," high loaves, pan loaves, and other styles of the same quality. The oven's heat reduces the 300 pounds of dough to 260 pounds of bread. The baker sells his bread at the rate of four cents a pound, or at an advantage of over 30 per cent, over what it cost him. There are 1,400 bakers, great and small, in this city, and to them is committed the trust of supplying bread for 1,300,000 persons. There are many bakers in this city who make 1,300 loaves of bread per day, and sell it for from $80 to $150, or at a net profit of $40. Little money is lost in the business, and most bakers do a cash trade. It is very seldom that bakers fail. The business is steady, reliable and attended by few risks, unless incompetent workmen.

Punishing the Gods in China.

A funny story illustrative of Celestial simplicity (or superstition) says the London Figaro, comes from Foochow, China. There is a joss-house, or temple, in that city, to which perons of revengeful disposition are wont to resort when desirous of obtaining satisfaction for an injury, the deities there being credited with a power to cause instant, death of those against whom their aid is invoked. After the death of the great Tartar general—the cause of which appears to have been rather mysterious—the supposition that he had fallen a victim to these particular josses was started by some of the gentry, and the victory thereupon gave instructions for an inquiry to be held into the matter.

The taotai was commissioned to see the order carried out, and he went to the temple and arrested fifteen of the josses.

These idols are of wood, about five feet in height. Before being taken into the presence of the taotai their eyes were put out, in order that they might not be able to indentify him in the realms above or below—where-ever they go! After an investigation a report of the viceroy, who at once gave orders that the josses should be decapitated and then cast in a pond! Yet withal China claims to be a civilized country.

A Substitute for Sugar.

Saccharine, the new substitute for sugar, which was discovered a few years ago by an eminent German Scientists, is said to possess the property of sweetness to an extraordinary degree. Since its discovery those interested have been striving diligently to reduce the cost of its broduction, in order to make it commercially useful. The latest information reports a partial measure of success. A factory has been arected looking to its production on a large scale. Whether it will ultimately replace sugar is not known. Experiments have shown that it is harmless when taken internally, and there appears to be nothing in the way of its use upon a large scale except its cost. It will, however, not be necessary to produce it at the same cost as sugar, since its sweetening power is much greater than that of sugar, so that one pound of the substitute will effect the same amount of sweetening as twenty times its weight in sugar. On the other hand it is asserted that saccharine has no nutritive properties, and for that reason can never take the place of sugar as a food, but it will meet with a warm reception by the medical profession, who can prescribe it for patients suffering from kidney trouble, in which sugar is strictly prohibited.

When to Take a Wife's Advice:

From the Yorkers Statesman.

A young couple, not long ago, received an invitation to an early dinner given in honor of an Eastern college professor. The guests were most of them former students of the professor, and the students clearly indicated that it was to be a most informal affair.

In discussing the important subject of what to wear, the young wife, who belonged to a family of high social position, and was "well up" in all these little matters which so clearly define the difference between the well-bred and those who do not always do the right thing in the right way, urged her husband to wear a plain suit.

But, not having been married long enough to know that his wife's advice had any particular value, he declined to be guided by her opinion, and donned a full-dress suit for the occasion.

However, at the house of their friend, when her husband joined her to escort her to the parlor, he rather nervously remarked sotto voco: "I believe I am the only man here in a dress suit." She replied in the sweetest manner possible: Oh, no! that is not so; all the waiters are in full-dress suits."

The Fascination of Crime.

From the New York Tribune.

One of the judges of the court of appeals was speaking to me the other day about Bedell, the forger. "There is beyond all doubt," he said, "a strange and powerful fascination about crime. I know it not only upon the testimony of criminals, but I have felt myself, and have heard many other men say, that they had felt, a certain form of the criminal tendency. It is the fascination of being hunted to which I refer. When I have had these poor devils up before me for trial, I have often wondered what I should do had I committed the crime of which they were guilty—murder, for instance. It is easy to think of a situation in which the temptation to commit murder without what the law considers justification would be too strong for many excellent men to resist. There are personal wrongs for which the sufferer sees no abequate remedy in an appeal to the courts. The life of the offender is the only price that will satisfy his aroused resentment, and before he realizes what he has done he is a murderer and a hunted man."

Frenchmen Who do Not Smoke.

From Voltaire.

Victorien Sardou, Ernest Renan, Jules Simon, Octave Feuillet and Francisque Sercey never make use of tobacco in any shape or form. Alexandre Dumas at one time enjoyed a cigar as much as most people, but he was advised by his doctor one day to break himself of the habit. Dumas, who happened to be indulging in a "weed" at the time, flung away the unfinished cigar, and has never had one between his lips since. Victor Hugo, Lamartine, Alfred de Vigny, the elder Dumas and the veteran savan, de Chevreul, whose one hundred and third birthday the Parisians lately feted, are among the other distinguished Frenchmen of the century who never yielded to the fascination of the seductive weed.

A Leap for His Wife.

Norwich Bulletin.

The passengers of a southerly bound afternoon train on the New London Northern railroad were somewhat excited the other day, just south of Stafford, by the conduct of Charles McFarlane, of Mansfield, who thought his wife was on board the train, and had just learned that she was not. He rushed to the platform, and although the train was moving at the rate of about twenty miles an hour, he deliberately sprang straight out into the air, and was struck by the corner of the car as it passed. Every one thought McFarlane had jumped to his death, but he had not. He struck the earth a sliding blow with his head and shoulders and turned more somersaults in a minute than the most renowned acrobat ever made in the same time in the circus ring. Then he slid about forty feet, bounding up into the air as he struck the uneven ties, like a double-ripper skipping over the winter jouncers on a Preston hillside. When he came to standstill he crawled up on his haunches like a disconcerted worm, and sat for a few minutes like the philosopher with his head resting on his hand. Then he got up and took his lacerated scalp and sprained shoulder to a Stafford doctor for repairs. The train did not stop, but ran on. He stopped in the surgeon's office and was fixed up. He found his wife, and they returned home on a later train. It is said McFarlane would not take another such leap for two wives.

The Denunciation of Noise.

"I can bear the heat very well," said a student forced to spend a summer in the city, "but I cannot endure the noise. Possibly he did not stop to consider that, in making such a declaration, he placed himself in illustrious company. Thomas Carlisle "could not abide" a noise, especially that of the morning crowing of cocks. Wallenstein, accustomed as he was to the din of battle, had an unconquerable dread of the barking of dogs, and even the clatter of the large spurs fashionable in his day. In order to insure quiet, he engaged twelve patrols to make regular circuits about his house night and day.

Neither Julius Cæsar nor the philosopher, Kant, could tolerate the crowing of poor chanticleer, who, indeed, seems to have very few friends amonge the studious and sensitive. Schopenhauer exceeds almost all lovers of quiet in the extravagance of his denunciation of noise. He declares that the amount which a man can bear with ease is in inverse ratio to his mental power.

"If I hear a dog barking for hours on the threshold of a house," he writes, "I know well enough what kind of brains I may expect from its inhabitants."—Youth's Companion.

There is to be great rivalry in Washington this season between the ministers from Persia, Corea, China and Japan. The Japanese minister has one great advantage in that he has a charming wife who is fast making many warm friends in Washington.

An American who has just returned from Spain brings some interesting gossip concerning the infant king of that country. It seems that his miniature majesty has but one great passion, which is, strangely enough, bologna sausage. Whenever he sees this unromantic edible he can hardly be restrained. A gentleman doing business in one of the down-town offices in New York has hit upon a novel scheme to protect himself from the annoyance of entertaining and wasting his time with individuals he does not want to see. When the visitor enters, the office boy, a bright lad and well schooled in the diplomacy of his profession, turns the knob and takes an instantaneous photograph of the intruder. This is developed, and forms one of a collection of undesirable visitors, which is kept in a book for the boy's instruction in the future. People who come to waste others' time, collectors with bills that they have paid, and the thousand and one disagreeable characters known to the average business man form the basis of this unique collection.

THE NEWS RESUME.

Washington Happenings.

An attache of the White House says that the executive mail is very heavy and hundreds of letters are received denouncing the president. They are consigned by the secretaries to the furnace.

The department of state does not anticipate any serious results from the complications between this country and Peru, growing out of the seizure of the building in which is situated the United States consular agency at Molendo, Peru. The building which was seized was the property of the Arequipa Railway company, the agent for the company being also the United States consular agent, and a room in the structure was occupied as the consulate. The Peruvian government took possession of the building in the absence of the consular agent on instructions from Lima, alleging that the building had been occupied solely for a protection. The consular records were not disturbed. As the action appeared to be a technical discourtesy toward the United States an apology was requested, but was refused by the Peruvian government on the ground that it had done nothing to warrant an apology.

The Casualty Calendar.

The workmen engaged in excavating the ruins of the late fire at Rochester, N. Y., came upon a ghastly find in the southeast corner of the ruins. Under machinery and debris of all kinds was found a heap of what were once human forms, crushed by the weight which was rested upon them for days. It is impossible as yet to ascertain how many bodies there are. Three have already been recovered and there were evidently several more near by. Later five other bodies were found in a bunch where they had evidently gone down to death together. The record stands, dead, twenty-one, sixteen bodies being taken out of the ruins and five dying from their injuries. There are twelve still missing, supposed to be still covered up. There seems to be no doubt that the death list will number thirty-three.

Talk About People.

The Hon. William Springer, chairman of the committee on territories in the house of representatives, writes Judge Brooks of Wichita, Kansas that in his opinion the bill bearing his name opening for settlement Oklahoma and adjoining territory will become a law by Jan. 1 next. The board of trade of Wichita is receiving every encouragement that the Oklahoma meeting to be held in that city, commencing on the 20th inst, will be one of the largest ever held in the interests of the desired legislation.

Petty Criminalities.

Mrs. Matilda Hellerman was shot and killed at Philadelphia by Peter Kretchman, a widower who lived in the next house. The only explanation he gave was that his wife who died about three weeks ago, had been ruined and driven to her death by Mrs. Hellerman;

While political meetings were in progress at Taylorville, Ill., unknown parties procured a quantity of sulphuric acid, which by means of a syringe was injected into about fifty horses belonging to farmers. Five of the animals have died, and the others are rendered useless. There have been no arrests.

The supreme court of Missouri affirmed the verdict of murder in the first degree against William Walker, chief of the notorious Bald Knobbers' organization is Southern Missouri. He will be hanged Dec 28. This decision also affects three others of the leaders of the gang who were convicted about the same time Walker was.

The coroner's jury, after three weeks' investigation of the causes of death of C. N. Thompson and Jacob Lee, killed by falling walls at the insane asylum, at Yankton, Dakota, returned a sealed verdict, which has been placed in the hands of the district attorney. The responsibilities for the death of the two men has been located by the jury, but who the parties are remains secret until they are in custody.

N. D. Vaughn, a blacksmith, was murdered in front of the Palace theater at Denver. Vaughn was on his way to work and stepped into the saloon attached to the theater for a cigar. While there a quarrel arose between several allnight loungers. Vaughn interfered to restore peace. One of the men named Anderson, followed Vaughn to the street and shot him through the head, killing him instantly. Anderson and his companions are in jail.

Hawleyville, Page county, Iowa, is in a high state of excitement over the determined attempt at murder and suicide by a disappointed lover, Stephen Franks. Franks sought the hand of Miss Carrie Love and she accepted him, but refused his additional request for a speedy marriage. He called on the young lady, and once more vainly urged her to consent to a speedy union. Enraged at her refusal, Franks drew a revolver and fired at his financee twice, the last shot taking effect. She fell, and Franks, believing he had killed her, shot himself. Neither is considered fatally wounded.

A serious shooting affray occurred at Burk's mining camp in Northern Idaho Charles Garrett, colored, and Joe Morgan, white, were drinking in a saloon, and engaged in an altercation. Both men drew revolvers and opened fire. Though the combatants could not see each other for smoke, after the first few shots, they blazed away until their revolvers were emptied. James Shannon, a by-stander, was shot in the stomach and cannot live; William Lynam, another spectator, was shot through the shoulder, and Garrett's arm was almost shot off. Morgan came out of the fight without a scratch and escaped to the mountains

Two farmers, Hiram Rotten and William Ashley, living in Custer county, Nebraska, called on a neighbor named Holstein to see him about some furniture which had disappeared from the school house in that district. They failed to return, and their neighbors became suspicious and instituted search for them. They saw hogs eating at some object in a haystack in Holstein's field, and going to the spot found the dead bodies of Rotten and Ashley. Rotten's face had been badly eaten by the hogs. Holstein cannot be found, and it is believed he took with him the team and wagon in which the murdered men drove to his house.

A sensational incident transpired in the district court room at Helena, M. T., when Martin Brown was found guilty of burglarly. Brown was arrested for forcing an entrance into the Montana Central office some months ago and stealing a lot of railroad tickets. During his trial he displayed great excitement and impudence, conducting himself in such a manner that his counsel finally became disgusted and abandoned their efforts to save him. After the jury had found him guilty Brown made an attempt to escape from the court room, and the officers had to use violence to subdue him. Judge McConnell sentenced him to twelve years in the penitentiary, and as he pronounced the sentence the prisoner began to curse and swear at him, using the foulest epithets ever heard in a court room.

Chauncey Goodrich, an old man employed as a laborer in the Ansonia Clock works in Brooklyn, N. Y., was arranged in court in that city upon a charge of attempting suicide. Mr. Goodrich was a prosperous clock-maker in Bristol, Conn., for a number of years and amassed a comfortable fortune. In 1858 he was elected a state senator, and again in 1870 he filled the same office. Several years ago he invested some money in Union Pacific stock and quickly made $50,000. He then came to Brooklyn to live and had a clock factory in Warren street. But the mania for speculation seized upon him, and he embarked in it wildly, with the result of losing over $100,000 and becoming a bankrupt. His business was sold out, and finally he gained employment in the factory of the Ansonia company. But he was despondent and in bad health, and with no future prospects he attempted to end his life. His wife is living in New Haven making a living by selling books.

The latest news from the Chickasaw Indian nation was brought from Tishomingo by James Harris, the auditor of the nation, to Gainesville, Tex., and is of startling character. Mr. Harris said that Gov. Guy was not killed as reported. The would-be assassin's bullet failed to hit him. This attempt to take the governor's life so aroused his friends that over three hundred of them, heavily armed, Gathered at Tishomingo to protect him, and W. Byrd, with 200 well armed men, also gathered near the capitol and went into camp. Auditor Harris and a few other Indians were at Gainesville preparing for the fray, which they said would come off, Guy having ordered his men to surround the Byrd party and exterminate them unless they surrendered without resistance. These Indians left at noon for Tishomingo to join Guy's forces, who they say will number 700. The non-citizens have espoused Guy's cause against the Byrd party. Unless the United States government interferes it will be a war of extermination.

Thomas Axworthy, the defaulting city treasurer of Cleveland, Ohio who departed the town $480,000 "short" and with $150,000 of other peoples money in his carpet sack, has written Mayor Babcock a letter. It was sent from Montreal on Oct. 29, and when the mayor received it he hastened to Montreal in order to have an interview with Axworthy. He remained there a week, and returned to Cleveland without having seen his man. The mayor has given newspapers a copy of the letter. The principal points in the letter are as follows: I went East about Oct. 1 for the purpose of collecting large sums loaned by me on call from time to time during the last four years, (at the suggestion of prominent Cleveland parties.) I have been receiving the interest regularly, but greatly to my surprise and horror, when I demanded the principal, I was answered, "We cannot pay it." Investigation proved such to be the case, although I supposed the parties to be worth millions. There was a combination to ruin me and it has succeeded. I am properly and deservedly, perhaps, the sufferer and exile.

Foreign Gleanings

George Goodin, the murderer of Farmer Embody, in Montana, is still held by the mounted police at Edmonton, awaiting the arrival of extradition papers from Ottawa and Washington. Goodin was in the Edmonton district for the past two months, but managed to elude the police. There is a brother of the man whom Goodin murdered living at Lake Ann, near Edmonton, who is waiting an opportunity to avenge his brother's death, and it is probable Goodin may not get out of the country alive.

F. S. Simpson, a young man who arrived at Tacoma, W. T. from Fresno, Cal., with strong letters of recommendation from the Wells-Fargo Express company, was given a clerkship in the Northern Pacific express company. No bonds were required of him. One night he went on duty and next day he was missing, and he is supposed to have taken a boat for Victoria, B. C. He had checked off several large consignments of money. One consignment to Benjamin Snipes, Ellensburg, Wash. T. large cattle owner, contained $10,000. One to C. O. Palmer, Palmer station, contained $1,000. There are supposed to be other sums. Simpson was a young man, a printer by trade, and worked in an office at Tacoma a few days before taking the clerkship.

Other News Jottings.

The sentence of Mrs. Robinson, the Massachusetts poisoner, has been commuted to imprisonment for life.

Dr. Neal Mitchell of Jacksonville, Fla., reports Nov. 14, 34 new cases of yellow fever—12 whites; deaths 2; total cases to date 4,552; total deaths, 392. J. K. Seward, one of the Harry Miner nurses, was taken down with a second attack of yellow fever. He also had it violently in the Memphis epidemic of 1877.

As a bevy of girls, under the care of several Sisters, were going from the convent of St. Joseph, at Augusta, Fla., to the cathedral, a carriage containing two young men drove up. One of the men jumped from the carriage seized one of the young ladies and attempted to place her in the vehicle. The Sisters surrounded the couple and succeeded in preventing the abduction. Finding his scheme foiled, the young man drove rapidly away before any one could stop him. Later he returned and explained his conduct. He is the auditor of Disston's sugar belt railroad, now building, and the young lady is the daughter of a well-known jeweler of Kissimee. They were much attached to each other, but the parents of the young lady objected to their marriage and sent the young lady to the convent. The young man succeeded in passing the yellow fever quarantine, secured a marriage license, took a carriage and attempted to secure the girl, with the unsuccessful result above detailed.

Iowa Dairy Interests.

The butter, cheese and egg convention opened at Waterloo, Iowa, with a discussion on "Pastures, Drainage and Grasses." The discussion was animated and exhaustive, but President Gates seemed to voice the sentiment of the major portion of the convention. He said:

The fertility of the soil of Iowa can be maintained only by grasses; therefore grasses should receive all the fertilizers put on the farm. Dairying is the best business for the farmers of Iowa, because it takes less fertility from the soil than any other line of farming. Dairying is surely and not slowly enriching the farmers of the state. Good grace is the basis of a good diary farm, and for this and adjoining states red clover is the best of all grasses for the dairyman.

The most interesting feature of the whole convention thus far, was the address of H. H. Heaf of Illinois, the originator of the dehorning process. He said three-fourths of the abortions in cattle are due to horns. There is a saving of one-fourth of the food fed dehorned cattle, because cattle without horns eat, drink and sleep together always in peace and equality. There is no boss of the herd and none so weak as to be driven from food and shelter, as the case in herds of horned cattle. The address of Dairy Commissioner Sherman showed that the number of creameries in Iowa has increased from 485 in 1887 to 510 in 1888. Cheese factories have grown from 56 to 65, separating machines from 215 to 382. The sale of oleomargarine is decidedly unpopular in Iowa, no dealer having been known to take out a second seller's license.

A Mexican Boundary Dispute.

It is learned at the department of state at Washington that the conflict over the course of the Rio Grande river at El Paso, between the inhabitants of that place and the Mexican dwellers at Paso del Norte on the opposite side of the river, is not a new question, but that the matter has been the subject of correspondence between the governments of Mexico and the United States for the past two years. The first complaint came from the Mexicans and was to the effect that the El Paso Land and Improvement Company had constructed works along the American shore of the river which were resulting in heavy erosion of the Mexican bank. To prevent this the Mexicans constructed a series of dams on their side which projected slightly into the river and arrested the process of the erosion there but transferred it, as it is asserted by the Americans, to the Texas side. The Texas authorities complained of this state of affairs, and meanwhile the Mexicans retaliated with a charge that the El Paso water supply pipe had been projected far enough into the river to affect navigation. The matter is still under discussion between the two governments. The treaty of 1884 forbids the construction of works on either bank that may interfere with navigation or change the course of the river, so that the questions at issue are largely those of facts, as to whether or not the operations on either side have or will actually result in interference with navigation or erosion of the banks.

An Important Insurance Decision.

The United States supreme court, through Chief Justice Fuller, has rendered an opinion of unusual interest to holders of life insurance policies. Thomas L. Hume, of the District of Columbia, died in 1881 totally insolvent, but leaving $85,000 in life insurance policies. The policies were by their terms payable to either the widow or children of deceased. The administrators and creditors of Hume's estate sought to force application of the proceeds of the policies to the payment of the debts due the creditors, on the ground that the premiums paid by Hume were a fraudulent transfer of an insolvent estate, and void as against creditors, and that consequently the proceeds of the policies should insure to the benefit of Hume's estate, and not to the beneficiaries named in the policies. The supreme court holds that the beneficiaries are entitled to the proceeds of all the policies without any deduction whatever on account of premiums paid, holding that a husband and father has a full right to insure his life in the interest of his wife and children, and that where such policies are affected in the name of the beneficiaries they are no par of the estate of a deceased insolvent, and therefore, cannot be regarded as a fraudulent assignment of any part of his estate when so effected.

Wholesale Lynching in Missouri.

A special from Ozark, Christian county Missouri, gives the details of the quintuple lynching by Bald Knobbers of witnesses against Dave Walker and other leaders of that organization. James Wilson, a farmer living near Chadwick on the Ozark range, came into Ozark after five coffins, which were to be used to bury the victims of the vengeance of the Bald Knobbers. Far from the nearest town, in the shadow of the Ozark range, lived the men who had been instrumental in bringing to justice the murderous leaders of the organization, and since the trials, which resulted in the apparent demoralization of the band, these men have lived in the belief that their troubles were over but a sight was seen which proved conclusively that the law-defying organization still existed. From the limbs of a mighty oak tree on the banks of a creek, only a short distance from the place of the Green and Eden murder, five corpses were swung to the breeze, and each one bore the dread symbol of death at the hands of the Bald Knobbers—a knife cut across the brow. A farmer who was early on his way to town was the first to see the terrible sight, and he quickly summoned his neighbors, who took down the bodies and found them to be those of Charles Green, James Eden, William Enders, Jonathan Wiley and Emmet Anderson. All these men had sworn to the facts of the killing of Green and Eden, brothers of the first named, and on their evidence Dave Walker was sentenced to pay the extreme penalty of the law. The bodies were placed in a wagon and carried to the homes of their families, there the story of the latest Bald Knobber raid was heard. At the home of Green and Eden, who occupied jointly a long, double log house, all was terror and dismay. As soon as the wails of the bereaved women and children could be stilled the following was told to the horrified listeners: At precisely 12 o'clock a knock was heard at the door, and in response to an inquiry the family were told that a neighbor had a stalled wagon near by and requested assistance. Green and Eden immediately went out, and as they passed the gate a single pistol shot was heard and out of the moonlight from the bushes rode about two hundred Bald Knobbers, with the disguise that a year ago was so well known in the Southwest. They surrounded the two unfortunate men, a short struggle followed, and then all rode away with their victims. The terrorized family could do nothing, and were afraid to stir out of doors until daylight. At the residence of Enders much the same story was told. At Wiley's house admittance was refused and the Bald Knobbers broke down the door and dragged the man from the house. During the melee several shots were fired at the assailing party by members of the family, and they are confident that one of the raiders was wounded. Anderson was captured while on his way home from Chadwick. The whole country is again under a reign of terror, as no one knows who did the deed, and each is distrustful of his neighbor. Sheriff Williams has gone to the scene of the murders with a large posse of men. The only clew is the Bald Knobber who is supposed to be wounded.

Truth or Fiction About Alaska.

The war department and the interior department authorities at Washington deny with emphasis the sensational story telegraphed to the Western Associated Press upon the authority of one Mrs. Voorhies. At the war department it was stated that there have been no soldiers in Alaska since 1872, when the last company was withdrawn. The entire force of the United States is located on a revenue cutter which cruises among the islands and prevents vessels from smuggling molasses to the Indians to make rum of. That disposes of the statement that United States soldiers are debauching young squaws. An interior department official says:

There seems to be such a demand on the part of the public for something beastly in detail on the way of reading matter, that I am not surprised to see a matter of this kind; but what surprises me is that only the imaginations of women seem able to supply this stuff. There is no more immorality among the Esquimaux women than among savage and half-civilized women the world over. It is true that Alaska has not a territoral government, but she has a governor, a judge, a marshal and a district attorney, all of whom are there to protect the Indians, and to punish the whites if necessary. Gov. Swineford has never mentioned any of these matters in his annual reports, except to praise the virtue and generally good conduct of the Indians. Missionaries and school teachers are all there to protect the little Indian girls, and would quickly bring to justice any white who attempted such a brutal outrage as Mrs. Voorhies describes. Whenever whites come in contact with Indians there is debauchery, but on a small scale only. Indian girls are sometimes sold by their parents, but they always go willingly, and generally treated well. Gen. Sherman said he had not seen the story in question, but when it was handed to him he perused it carefully.

"This is all a fiction. There isn't a soldier or sailor in Alaska," Gen. Sherman exclaimed, laying down the paper.

"But isn't there a military post there?"

"No; I withdrew the troops myself. They were not needed there, and our army was too small to keep a garrison where the people were peaceful and inoffensive. Of course, as Alaska belonged to us, it had to be looked after somehow, so we threw the burden of the responsibility onto another department, and a revenue cutter was detailed to patrol the coast."

Opening an Indian Reservation.

The Indian bureau at Washington has been laboring for some months to get the affairs of the Indians upon the great Northern reservation in Montana in shape for the winter, so that the 17,500,000 acres of land to be thrown open to settlement under the terms of the agreements lately ratified by congress, may be ready for settlers in the spring. The new agency for consolidated tribes will be at some point on the Milk river, although the inspector who was sent out to look up a site recommended another at some distance from the river. The site selected is the one recommended by the Indian agent. The appropriation allowed by congress for surveying is so small that little can be done with it, and the season is so far advanced that little can be done this year. Settlers can go upon the land and settle without surveys, however, and it is not unlikely that a new land office will be established at Great Falls early in the spring and settlers allowed to file at once. The Northern Pacific and St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba roads are both desirous of surveys, as a large immigration to Montana is looked for in the spring. Delegate Toole made an effort to secure an appropriation of $200,000 for surveys at the last session of congress, but it was cut out of the bill in conference. Allotments of lands to the Indians began this fall and will be continued in the spring.

The president has ordered that $5,000 be given the Indian bureau from the relief fund in the treasury for use in feeding the Northern Cheyennes on the tongue River reservation who were said some time ago to be starving. Congress appropriated in the last bank bill about $18,000 for feeding the Cheyennes, and that was consumed before the middle of October. The difficulty in providing for these Indians lies in the uncertainty of the Indian bureau to the number of Cheyennes at the Tongue River agency. The Northern Cheyennes belong to the Pine Ridge agency in Southern Dakota. A portion of the appropriations made for the Cheyennes is laid aside for the Tongue River Indians; but as hundreds of the Pine Ridge Cheyennes go up in summer and stay for months with the Tongue River band, they soon eat the agent out of house and home. Meanwhile the Pine Ridge appropriation cannot be used for the Cheyennes at Tongue River. The president has also directed that $7,000 be used for the Relief of the starving Chippewas at Turtle Mountain, Dak.

Sensational Murder in Omaha.

A highly sensational murder was committed at the Paxton hotel in Omaha. A lady entered the office shortly before 8 o'clock and registered as Mrs. Henry W. King, Jr., of Chicago, and was assigned to a room. She then took the elevator to the third floor, and had the bell boy point out to her the room of Harry W. King, who was a prominent merchant of Omaha. She knocked, and King responded that he would be dressed and out in a minute. He soon opened the door and stood face to face with the woman who claimed to be his wife.

"Well, I am here, I suppose you are not pleased at it," she said.

"No, I am not. I want you to keep away. You go down in the parlor, and I'll see you in a short time," he replied.

"No, sir, I shall not leave this door until you come with me," she said. "Now Harry, you know how you have treated me, but while I live my love will always be with you. I will not leave you."

He started down the hall, but the woman caught him by the arm and said:

"Harry, will you not accompany me to breakfast? I mean you no harm. I intend to prosecute you for bigamy, and my father will prosecute you for forging his name. That is what I came to inform you of."

They then went over to the parlor on the second floor, where they had a few words. King endeavored to leave her and started for the elevator. Mrs King then pulled a revolver and fired at him. He ran westward down the hall, she in pursuit. Just as he was going down the grand stairway into the rotunda Mrs. King fired three shots. At the last shot Mr. King fell headlong upon the second landing in front of a large mirror. Mrs. King ran down to him, and kneeling beside him said:

"I HAVE KILLED MY HUSBAND."

He died instantly. Rising to her feet she walked down the stairs into the rotunda and sat down in a chair. She delivered her pistol to the landlord, and repeated that she had killed her husband. She was soon taken to the police station and her dead husband was conveyed to the coroner's office. The bullet entered at the back and penetrated the heart. The prisoner states she is the legal wife of Mr. King; that she was married to him four years ago in Chicago, that they lived peacefully together until four weeks ago, when Mr. King came to Omaha to open a clothing house. She learned that Mr. King had recently married a Miss Duffy of Kansas City. This was actually the case, and Mr. King was living with her in Omaha. This was what brought Mrs. King of Chicago to Omaha, and the result was the murder of her husband. She sent a dispatch here informing the last Mrs. King that Mr. King was a bigamist. The last Mrs. King was not in the city at the time of the tragedy, having gone over to Council Bluffs. Mr. King is the son of Henry W. King, the millionaire clothing merchant of Chicago. A few years ago he married a young woman named Ora Walker. The marriage was obnoxious to the parents, and caused considerable talk. Mr. King, Sr. gave the woman $10,000 to consent to a divorce from his son. Young King next married the woman who killed him. Her maiden name was Eliza Beidley, daughter of a retired capitalist of Chicago. Young Mr. King's friends claim that he was legally divorced from her, and that he was lawfully married a few weeks ago to wife No. 3, Miss Duffy, whose parents reside at Louisville, Mo. The murderess, however, insists that she was not divorced, and if there was any divorce she knows nothing of it. The deceased, although having only recently located in Omaha had made many friends, to whom the tragedy was a great shock, and the revelations concerning his life were a great surprise. He was a pushing, active business man, about thirty years of age, and the house which he opened here under the name of Browning, King & Co. was the eighth branch house of Henry W. King & Co., of Chicago.

What Opium Did for one Victim.

The latest sensation in Boston is the domestic troubles of Fred Hurst of New York, proprietor and Manufacturer of "Pond's extract." His beautiful and accomplished wife has been reveling in the intoxicating bliss of opium smoking in the Chinese joints in Boston, and when so doing has been guilty of infidelity to her husband. That is what the lawyers claim who have been for the past few weeks collecting evidence. They have unearthed some facts that will make people open their eyes. The story has many sad features. The wife was a governess before her marrage to Hurst. When they were married they took an extended trip through Europe, and Hurst covered her with diamonds, for she was still extremely wealthy. Upon their return they settled down in an elegant house of Gramercy streets, and everything that money could command was placed at the pleasure of the young wife. She was a great sufferer, however, from neuralgia, and was dosed with morphine to relieve her from the excruciating pain. In this way she became a slave and was fast succumbing to its effects when her husband sought to wean her from the habit gradually through the agency of opium smoking. The young woman was cured of the morphine habit, but became an inveterate smoker of opium. The quiet life of her husband became distasteful to her. Lower and lower she fell, until at last, forgetting her marriage vows, she found a lover in Frank Webb, one of the alleged proprietors of a joint. Mr. Hurst made another attempt to drag her from her enthrallment by taking her to Europe once more; but the fatal drug had too strong a hold upon her, and when she returned, something like a year later, she again relapsed into her old condition. Then it was that her husband gave her up as a hopeless case. He cut loose from her, but allowed her $5,000 a year upon which to live.

It is proposed at Washington to organize a battalion of four companies in the national guard, to be composed exclusively of employes of the departments—one company from the state, war and navy departments, one company from the treasury department, one company from the postoffice and interior departments and one company from the government printing office. Gen. Ordway suggests that in case the necessity should ever arise for guarding the department buildings; these companies would be thoroughly reliable and well acquainted with the buildings.

In the inquest in the lantern works fire case at Rochester, N. Y., Henry M. Hose, a workman employed in the works, testified that it was common talk on his floor that the engineer, Vankorff, who is suspected of setting fire to the building, was crazy. The subscription lists are growing rapidly, and there will be a handsome sum collected for the unfortunates.

Resolutions in the K. of L.

At their session in Indianapolis, the Knights of Labor heard the reports of the general officers and committees. There are in the Knights of Labor between ten and twelve thousand women, and the number has reached 35,000. These organizations are represented by Mrs. L. M. Barry of Philadelphia, general organizer and lecturer, Mrs. A. P. Stevens of Toledo and Miss Mary Burke of Bellaire, Ohio. A session was almost entirely devoted to the reports of the treasurer, Frederick Turner, of the general investigator of woman's work and wages, Mrs. L. M. Barry, and of the executive board. The general treasurer gives an itemized report of the receipts and expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1888, and in a supplementary report up to Oct. 31, 1888, as follows:

The receipts in the first, from supplies, per capital tax, Journal, charters, special defense assessment, appeals, and miscellaneous, aggregate $222,507.09. The expenditures were $222,507.09, including $75,019.11, donations; $49,830.67 in salaries; $23,005.98 in printing; $14,959.80 in mileage, and smaller items for paper, hotels, railroad fares, badges and buttons, expressage, etc. For the four months covered in the supplementary report the receipts were $52,591.72, and the expenditures $42,926.63. In conclusion, Mr. Turner says according to the receipts for tax the membership has decreased about three hundred thousand during the past fiscal year, and at the present time the receipts are not sufficient to meet the necessary expenses. In my opinion a reduction of $25,000 in the expenses can be accomplished without detriment to the order.

In her report, as general investigator, Mrs. L. M. Barry gives an interesting detailed account of her work during the year in visiting different parts of the country; her understanding of her work being that "I was to do everything in my power that would in my judgment have a tendency to educate and elevate the woking women of America, and ameliorate their condition." In furtherance of her work, she has lectured and also has investigated the work done and wages received by women and girls in various industries all over the country. Mrs. Barry gives prices paid women and girls in various parts of the country visited and describes the disadvantages under which they work. She found much to criticise and condemn.

Silver Dollars Missing.

Some irregularity has been discovered in connection with the transfer of silver dollars from the mint at New Orleans to Washington for storage in the large new vault in the court yard of the treasury building, which has resulted in the loss of $1,500. The loss was discovered but did not become known outside the department until later. Treasury officials refuse to speak of the matter, and very little is known beyond the facts already stated. The silver is shipped by the Adams Express company, and the loss will probably fall upon it unless it can be proved that the packages containing the money were tampered with before they came into its possession. The money is shipped in wooden boxes containing two canvas bags, with $1,000 in each bag. The boxes are carefully sealed before they leave the mint for delivery to the express company, and are carefully guarded from that time until their delivery at the treasury department. They are therefore under surveillance from the time they leave the mint until they are delivered to the agents of the United States treasury. The shipments average $500,000 a day, and the silver already placed in the vault amount to over thirty million dollars. All this coin was brought from Philadelphia and New Orleans, but mostly from the first-named city. The shipments from New Orleans were begun only a few weeks ago, and it is in these that the discrepancies occurred. So far as known, only two boxes were tampered with. In one of them the entire contents of one of the bags, amounting to $1,000, were removed and replaced with bird shot. In the other box, only about half the contents of one of the bags, or about $500, was taken, and shot and pieces of lead were substituted. The robbery was not discovered until the bags were weighed at the treasury. The scales weighing the silver overbalanced when these bags were placed on them, and a hurried examination of their contents disclosed the fraud which had been perpetrated. These bags were parts of different consignments and are believed to be all that have been robbed. The agent of the express company was at once notified, and the treasurer refused to accept the bags. A treasury official says that the loss so far does not exceed the amount stated, and that the responsibility for it rests entirely between the express company and the officials at New Orleans who handled these particular boxes.

Tracking a Murderer.

The hopes of the London police of catching the Whitechapel murderer, which had almost entirely died out, were raised to the acme of buoyancy in consequence of the testimony at the Kelly inquest of George Hutchinson, a groom, who had known the victim for some years, and who saw her with a male companion shortly before 2 o'clock on the morning of the murder. Hutchinson testified that he saw a well dressed man, with a Jewish cast of countenance, accost the woman on the street at the hour mentioned on Friday morning, and the circumstance of his acquaintance with her induced him to follow the pair as they walked together. He looked straight into the man's face as he turned, to accompany the woman, and followed them to Miller court out of mere curiosity. He had no thought of the previous murders, and certainly had no suspicion that the man contemplated violence, since his conspicuous manifestations of affection for his companion as they walked along formed a large part of the incentive to keep them in sight. After the couple entered the house Hutchinson heard sounds of merriment in the girl's room, and remained at the entrance to the court for fully three-quarters of an hour. About 3 o'clock the sounds ceased and he walked into the court, but finding that the light in the room had been extinguished he went home. During the hour occupied in standing at the entrance to or promenading the court he did not see a policeman. There is every reason to believe Hutchinson's statement, and the police place great reliance upon his description of the man, believing that it will enable them to run him down. The witness who testified to having seen the woman enter the house with a man with a blotched face was evidently mistaken as to the night, as his discription of her companion is totally unlike that of Hutchinson's in every particular.

Riot on a Railroad Car.

As the Omaha train, of West Superior was about to cross the first span of the bridge coming from Duluth, a dispute arose between several occupants of the smoking car over some trifling matter, which finally resulted in a general fight, in which an unknown man figured very conspicuously. The unknown man is described as being a short, thick-set man, with light moustache. After knocking down several occupants of the car he drew a revolver and shot Ben Switzer through the neck, inflicting a severe flesh wound. He then fired again, hitting another man, whose name was not learned, in the cheek. At this the shooting became general and several shots were exchanged, during which time a man rushed into the ladies' car and fired several shots, one of which took effect in the leg of Frank Boggert, a resident of Superior. The terrified passengers were rushing in all directions to avoid being hit. The train was stopped just before the bridge was reached, and during the excitement the unknown man made an attempt to escape. As the train started three shots were fired, and a lady, who was looking out of the window, saw a man fall and believed he was fatally wounded. The three wounded men were brought to West Superior. There were two who were badly pounded about the head by the stranger. Boggert was taken to a hotel, where his wound was dressed. The stories as to who did the shooting in the ladies' car where Boggert received his wound, conflict considerably. The matter is being investigated and doubtless some clew will be obtained as to the indentity of the rioters. Boggert did not know anything of the fight in which he was shot.

C. J. Jones of Golden City, Kan., a member of the legislature and a wealthy rancher, has purchased Maj. Bedson's entire herd of tame buffaloes, consisting of fifty head, and is at Winnipeg for the purpose of conveying the animals to his ranch in Kansas, where he has about a dozen head. It is said that the dominion government is offering big inducements to Mr. Jones if he will resell the buffaloes so as to retain them in their corral at Stonymountain.

Is This a Clue to the Whitechapel Murder?

The New York Zeitung contains a cable from Paris their regular correspondent telling of a possible clew to the Whitechapel murderer. The correspondent says that years ago when he was in Paris, that city was startled by a series of murders by a man who was called "Savior of lost souls." The correspondent made inquiries into the case and gleaned the following facts:

His name was Nichalaus Wassillyie and he left the Russian city of Tiraspol on the first of January this year. Wassillyie has been imprisoned there for many years. This is the story of his career in Paris.

In the year 1872 there was a movement in the orthodox church of Russia against some sectarians which caused a great deal of excitement. Nichalaus Wassillyie left a good home and rich parents, but Nichalaus was a fanatic and sectarian. He soon assumes the role of leader among them. The chief belief of his sect was the renunciation of all earthly joys in order so secure immortal life in paradise. Wassillyie fled to Paris, He was an excellent type of a Russian. He had a tall, elastic figure a regular physiognomy, with burning, languishing eyes and waxenlike complexion. He used to stay all day long in his room, studying some large books, at nightfall he went out and wandered aimlessly through the streets until the morning dawned. He was often seen talking with abandoned women in the street and it soon became known that he followed a secret mission in doing so. That is when the voice of the people calls him "Savior of lost souls." First he tried mild persuasion in speaking to the fallen creatures. When mere words had no effect he went so far as to put premiums on virtue, and gave large sums of money to the cocottes on condition that they would lead a new life. Some of the women were touched by his earnestness and promised to follow his advice. He could often be seen on the corners preaching to gaudy nymphs, who bitterly shed tears, but his mission did not seem to be crowned with success. He had often met girls who had taken as holy oath that they would sin no more again on the street. Then there was a change. He would approach a woman, speak to her kindly and follow her home. Then, when alone with the helpless creature, he would take out a butcher knife, kneel on her prostrate body and force her to take a holy oath not to solicit again. He always went away seemingly happy. One evening "The Saviour of Souls" as usual left his home. In the Rue de Richelieu he met a young woman. She had an elf-like elegant figure, and beautiful blue eyes. Wassillyie was armed against the glances of women, but this girl's look seemed to make a deep impression on him. He spoke to her. She was a lost one, too. Not with brutal force, but with kind sympathy he touched her so deeply that she told him the story of her life—the story of a poor parentless girl whom fate had torn from happiness and splendor, into a world of misery and shame. Wassillyie, for the first time in his life, fell in love with a woman. He procured her a place in a business house and paid liberally for her support, although he made her believe that she was supporting herself. For several weeks the girl, who had some regard for her protector, kept straight in the path of virtue. But one day when Wassillyie visited her home—a thing he seldom did, and then only when and old guardian of hers was present—he found that she was gone. She had left a letter to him, in which she said that, though thankful to him for all his kindness, her life was now too "Ennuyant" for her, and that she preferred to be left alone. Wassillyie was in a fearful mind after this. He wandered so restlessly through the streets as to awaken the attention of the constables. Eight weeks afterward he disappeared. At the same time Madeline, the woman whom he had supported, was found murdered in the quarter where she had formerly led a life of shame. Two days afterward, in a quiet side street of the Faubourg St. Germain, the corpse of another murdered woman was found. Three days afterward a phryne of the Quartier Mauffeaard was butchered at night time. All the murders were perpetrated in the same horrible way as those in Whitechapel. Jewels and everything of value on the corpses remained untouched. Five more victims were found butchered in the Arrondissement des Pantheon between the Boulevards St. Michael and de L'Hospital. Then in the Rue de Lyon an attack was made on a street girl who had the chance to cry for help before she was strangled. A throng gathered, the police arrived and the would-be murderer was captured. It was Nichalaus Wassillyie. The mob wanted to lynch him, but he was protected. When his trial was in progress, his lawyer, Jules Glannier, claimed that his client was insane. The jury decided that, such was the case and Wassillyie was sent back to Russia, after a short stay in the private asylum of Bayonne. From Teraspol he was released on Jun. 1 of this year. Is Wassillyie the Whitechepel murderer? He is in the possession of considerable wealth.

Crimes and Horrors in Alaska.

Mrs. Voorhees, a well known lady of New York, has recently returned from an extended tour through the great Northwest. To a reporter she related some of the experiences of her travels:

"I have journeyed over 18,000 miles by land and water," she said, "but the incidents of the trip have been, I dare say, much like those of other tourists who followed the same route. What has impressed me most profoundly and filled me with a horror which grows with the recollection of it is the awful condition of the Indian woman in Alaska. Travelers hint vaguely at this evil, official reports allude briefly and apologetically to it, but the great world is ignorant of its existence. If people realized that in the wilds of its Alaskan territory this civilized, refined, advanced nineteenth century United States holds a perfect inferno of crime and torture where helpless women and mere children are being sacrificed and gradually exterminated, surely some remedy might be found. In all that country there is no law—there can be no restraint—and the lowest animal passions of the rough miners, trappers, hunters, soldiers and sailors rage unchecked. The Indian woman is considered the lawful spoil of these men. They steal them if they can, if not, they buy them from their parents for a knife, a jug of rum or a string of beads. If these considerations do not weigh, then they make the old people drunk and carry off the girl. A miner will come and dicker for a child fourteen and bear her of shrieking with terror. She becomes the slave of the whole camp, and is finally sent back to her people to die.

"Do none of the Indians exhibit a desire to protect their women?" Mrs. Voorhees was asked.

"Seldom: and if they did what would it avail? Soldiers are kept there at the expense of the government to prevent their rising. What do they do? They work in the mines, hunt and fish, that is, when they don't drink themselves to death. There was a case not long ago of a whole tribe perishing in one winter from rum. They had sold all the furs and skins they had in their possession for liquor, and when those who had survived the immediate effects of their potations had to meet the bitter weather without clothing, they froze to death. It is a common law among the Indians that they must not dispose of a daughter without the consent of the mother squaw, and as the mother usually has an instinct at least which prompts her to protect her offspring from the white man, the only way to deal with her is by drink. The squaws are as given to liquor as the males, so the white man seeking a little maiden brings enough drink for father and mother. When both have succumbed to its influence, there is nothing more to stay the destroyer of the child. The poor, shrinking, shrieking little victims are dragged off to their fate and there is no power to succor them. Mrs. McFarlane told of one woman who brought her last remaining girl to the school, and prayed that she might be taken in. She told a heartrending tale of how her other daughters had been torn from her by brutal whites and carried to ruin and death, and she said she was powerless to protect this last little one, who was even then threatened with a like fate. So she besought them to receive the child. I'll give you the very words of the Indian mother. They were: 'I want to keep child with me—I darsn't. White man will take her away. had several pretty squaw. When they about fourteen, they all stolen by white man. He only sent them home to die.'"

Henrietta, Texas, was aroused by a terrific explosion, but as it was supposed that the Republicans were still celebrating, no investigation was made at the time. An hour later it was discovered that a portion of the court house had been blown down. Dynamite had been placed under a wing of the building and almost totally destroyed it. The buildings adjoining on the public square were also damaged. It is believed that a desire to destroy the records was at the bottom of the affair.

The sentence of Mrs. Robinson, the Massachusetts poisoner, has been commuted to imprisonment for life.

GROWING UP.

Corinne Marshall was the brightest girl in the school district where her father's large, stony farm was situated. Her mother had read a translation of De Staël's famous romance, hence her daughter's name, given with many wishes that the little maiden might grow up to be something out of the common order. At 6 she studied grammar, and spelled the big boys and girls "down" at an old fashioned spelling school; plainly there could be no question about her brilliancy.

There was a farmer's boy as well as a farmer's girl; there always is, only the boy is apt to be, if more solid, not so ready—not so "smart," as the New England expression is. No special star had shone over the boy's baptismal front, and he was named plain Job—Job Austin.

Job's father was in standing and property, about on an equality with Corrinne's, but the little fellow was no match for Corinne. However, the young Job lifted his gray eyes to the "brightest girl," drew her on his "towed" her on the ice; brought her peppermint drops and licorice stick and carved various toys for her at odd times, such as bedsteads for her dolls, and a set of wooden dishes for their tea table.

While Job was still struggling, in his old clothes, with "chores" at home, and unknown quantities at school, his little favorite was sent to live with her aunt in the village, a dozen miles away, for the sake of greater educational privileges. Then the smart girl developed rapidly. She soon showed a remarkable gift of expression, and in the department of composition easily led her school, became the editor of the school "paper," the president of a literary society, and withal a very careless student. To keep up in her classes required no effort and she fell into the error of thinking that success would come to her without hard work.

In the meantime Job showed a patience equal to that of his widely known namesake. He extracted roots, cube and square, to say nothing of "grubbing" roots on the old farm; and every step he took he cleared the way of all difficulties. No half way work for Job. He was still awkward, ill dressed, hesitating, and he blushed furiously just at the times and on the occasions when he most desired to appear cool and collected. Many a time he had begun a letter to Corinne, sitting at his desk at noon time, or after school, anxiously trying to compose a document worthy of so bright a being. But, though as patient as the original Job, he never succeeded in finishing a letter that he thought good enough.

At last a turn came in the tide of Job's life. A literary gentleman in Bagdad, the village where Corinne was living at her aunt's offered to "board and school" him in return for such help as the boy could easily give morning and evening. He was to enter the graded school, and on examination was found ready for the intermediate department. Corinne was in a private school for girls. It was not long before the two old friends met in the street. Corinne was with half a dozen gay school girls.

"Who is that fellow with hayseed in his hair?" asked one of them, as Job came toward them smiling and blushing. Corrine bowed coolly, pretending not to see the outstretched hand, and hurried on.

"A mistake," she said. "I look like dozens of other people, it seems." Corinne justified this story to her conscience on the ground that Job had really made a mistake in supposing she was going to keep up the old friendship.

Job thought, generous fellow, that it was a veritable mistake. A little near sighted, he often made mistakes of identity; and he promised himself to look more carefully next time he met a group of young ladies, blushing the deepest peony red in thinking of his boldness.

Corinne now entered upon a new period of her inspired career. She wrote a poem! Sitting in her room after study hour, with her hair down and her hands pressed to her temples, she slowly evolved the wonderous thing. How astonished she was to find that she, Corinne Marshall, could actually weave rhymes and sentiments and flowers of speech like the real poets whom she worshiped afar off. She showed the celestial manufacture to her own special girl friend, Cecilia Hopkins. It was one of those twilight hours of loving communion over the fire, when, with arms around each other's waists, school girls tell the dearest friends everything, that the poem was brought out and read. Cecilia was in raptures. She always knew her darling Corinne was a genius. And where would she send it?

"Send it?"

"Yes, to what magazine or newspaper? Surely the world should not be deprived of such a gem!"

Now, unknown to Corinne, the gentleman with whom Job was living was the editor of The Bagdad Carrier Dove, a sheet devoted to news and elegant culture.

"I'll send it to The Dove," said Corinne, after her friend had left her to the literary leisure she longed for. "Yes, to The Dove, on whose white wings it shall be wafted far away to meet kindred hearts."

Carefully was the poem copied and re-copied, till, in appearance, at least, it was worthy of the classic name signed boldly at the close. In the chill dusk of a winter evening a young girl might have been seen walking up and down the street, casting longing glances at a lamp post; for the author's heart failed her at the last moment. But the appearance of a teacher brought matters to a crisis, and the envelope weighted with destiny was dropped through the iron slit.

The boy in the office of The Dove, by this time highly prized by the editor, recognized the old time quirks and quirls, the tails of the g's and y's and q's, and the heavy shading of the upward strokes. He helped the crude little "poem" into a corner of The Carrier, his heart beating with manly pleasure at doing a service for his little love.

Corinne was made a poet by acclamation in the school room; for of course the authorship of "Life's Disappointments" was an open secret. Fifty copies of The Carrier were orderer, and the office boy was sent with them to Mrs. Deportment's school. He arrived at the recreation hour, when the young ladies, a gay, fluttering, bright eyed crowd, were "taking exercise." Some were promenading, some dancing, some chatting, some swinging dumbbells, some tossing a shuttlecock.

"The copies of The Carrier Dove you sent for," said Job, addressing the girls en masse.

All occupations were deserted, and the girls, acting from a common impulse of fun, came forward to interview the "devil," as they were pleased to call Job. They made him take a chair on the platform, they asked him all kinds of questions concerning editorial and newspaper interiors; finally they introduced, with mock ceremony, the distinguished authoress, Corinne. Job's face lighted up. Here was relief from his tormentors.

Not a sign did Corinne give that she recognized her old friend; indeed, she joined in the fun at his expense. Poor Job had greater need than ever of the quality associated with his name, and only on the ringing of the bell calling the girls to lessons was he released.

At the end of five years. The young ladies of Mme. Deportment's school are scattered far and wide; some are married, some are teachers, some are busy with the wearisome nothings of gay society.

As for Corinne, she is at home on the old stony farm. Her mother is dead, and she is her father's housekeeper. She has taken a nom de plume, for repeated experiences of "declined with thanks" have made her desire to hide her identity. Nevertheless, certain successes have kept her in heart and hope; and as she is not scarcely twenty, she still looks forward to a distinguished literary career.

In the meantime a new light has arisen. Far and wide the letters, stories and scientific articles of Lew Etoile are known andadmired. It is announced that he is to establish a journal, called The People, in a town not a thousand miles from the Marshall farm.

Corinne, on the lookout for new worlds to conquer, says; "There is a chance for me." She prepares a piece of verse, elaborate, romantic, and not without merit. She sends it, with a note inclosed signed by her own name, to the great Mr. Etoile. Then through weeks of suspense she waits.

"It's come back," shouts her heartless little brother, swinging a letter over his head, and quite regardless of the presence of a neighborhood gossip.

"What makes you keep a sendin' stuff to the editors?" says her sister, an enfant terrible, who is great in mathematics and despises her elder sister's name and pretensions.

Corinne takes the letter humbly and puts it in her pocket. By and by she goes out into the blossoming orchard and opens the editorial envelope, walking up and down under the fragrant trees. There is the poem in which so much hope had been folded, and a long letter in a bold, firm hand.

"Miss A. B. C. shows facility. There are hints of talent. Will she oblige the editor by writing an article on some subject of which she has knowledge—positive, clear information?" The letter went on with kind, discriminating advice, worth more than gold to a girl like Corinne.

"Write about something of which I have knowledge!" repeated the girl, stopping to break a bunch of apple blossoms. "What do I know?" She looked into the tinted cups as if for an answer. "I don't know anything," she said presently, throwing herself down upon the turf in sorrowful abandon; "but I can learn." This correlative came after a burst of tears after an hour's reflection.

A few day after this Corinne received by mail a treatise on the keeping of poultry, which she herself had ordered. This she set herself to study, and soon became interested in details of breed, feeding, housing, etc. All the books and newspapers of importance bearing on the subject Corinne read industriously. Then came practical work. After six months' experience the young lady wrote a modest article "Poultry Raising," and sent it to The People. A cordial answer was received with a liberal check—Corinne's first compensation for literary work.

To the old orchard trees the girl went in her excitement and joy. They were bare; empty nests hung from their boughs; and the dead grass about them was flecked and patched with snow. But in Corinne's heart there was summer. Mr. Etoile's note was so kind, so encouraging; he praised her style, he suggested books for her to read; he promised, if she worked and studied, a noble success by and by—not necessarily in poultry articles, though said articles suited The People to a dot, and he wished more of them. He named various books on industrial subjects—bee raising, silk spinning, flower culture, etc.—and advised a reading up of the subjects and articles of the same.

"In the meantime," said he, "keep your eyes open. There must be much in your country world worth writing about. In some out of door searching, a real poem may show itself in moss or lichen, the glance of a little wildwood dweller, or the flash of a jeweled brook."

It was a year from the time that Corrinne questioned the apple blossoms in her despair. It was noised about that Editor Etoile was visiting in the neighborhood. Corinne's intimate friends, the "heartless brother" and the enfant terrible included, began to anticipate a triumph for their friend and sister. She was a correspondent of Lew Etoile's—a favorite contributor to The People. No one else with so much right could aspire to the great man's favor.

In the course of time Corinne was invited to a garden party to meet the star. The hour came, and the editor was introduced. Corinne stepped forward eagerly, all smiles. The gentleman bowed politely, exactly as to twenty others to whom he had been presented. The whole company, looking on, understood Corinne's humiliation. She soon slipped away, and on reaching home went wandering under the blooming orchard trees.

"How handsome he is! How distinguished his style! Nobody at the party could compare with him. Only a little older than I, and he has almost a national reputation!" So Corinne mused, as she walked up and down the fragrant, wind blown alleys.

By and by she seated herself, and, taking pencil and paper from her pocket, began to scribble, as the best way of forgetting her disappointment. Gradually a sense of the ineffable beauties of her little corner of the earth stole over her. Soft, fragrant air, azure sky, white banks of vapor, rosy shapes of bud and bloom, the humming of happy insects, the thrill of home going birds, the lovely greenery of notched and scalloped and blade shaped leaves—all met and mingled in her soul, producing a sort of ecstacy. Her thoughts began to take rhythmical form, and a genuine poem grew under her almost unconscious hand.

As she sat leaning against a gnarled old trunk, pink petals nestling in the crimps of her black hair and in the folds of her pale blue gauzy dress, she made a charming picture. At least so thought the distinguished "Mr. Etoile," coming gently along the orchard path, his footfalls hushed by the matted turf.

"Corinne!"

"Mr. Etoile!"

The girl rose, her cheeks hot with blushes.

"Forgive me for treating you so badly just now. Let us walk under the trees and talk about old times. Do you remember the day I pulled you out of the cranberry bog when you broke through the ice and thought you were drowning?"

Corinne looked up in amazement. It was—yes, it was Job Austin; light locks, freckles, and all.

"Do you forgive me?" he persisted.

"I think we are quits," she said, now able to look up roguishly through her blushes. "Strange I didn't recognize you when you were introduced to me today."

"Don't speak of that," said Job. "What is this?" and he took possession, as by editorial right, of the paper fluttering in her hand. His face grew radiant as he read.

"Dear old comrade," he said, "I have not been disappointed in you. This is genuine, and it is beautiful! It is a growth, not a bit of manufacture."

When "the planet and his satellite," as Corinne's saucy sister called them, left the orchard, there was a happy light in both their faces. Thereafter literary affairs called them often together. As to sentiment, the gossips of the neighborhood are about equally divided; a part asserting vehemently that it is a heart affair, the others denying the same with equal earnestness.—Mrs. M. F. Butts in Demorest's Monthly.

A Nebraska Ghost Story.

Abraham McAdams, one of the wealthiest farmers of Blakeman, Neb., is making arrangements to enter the ministry. This determination on the part of Mr. McAdams was a great surprise to his friends. There is a queer story in connection with it: He started to Blakeman in company with a neighbor named Ira Boyce. When near a place called Harrer's Draw, about four miles east of Atwood, they saw a cloud shaped like a balloon, and occupied apparently by a woman, arise from the draw and float off towards the northwest. It went but a short distance when it turned and came towards them. When about 200 yards distant and 100 feet in the air the balloon suddenly dissolved and left the woman with long floating hair, which completely covered her shoulders and reached to her waist, standing alone. She had one hand outstretched towards McAdams as if beckoning him. The ghostlike scene suddenly changed again, and in place of the woman stood a horse with a large pair of saddle bags across its back, and by its side a man with hair worn rather long and a black stovepipe hat on his head. He was dressed in clerical garb and McAdam at once recognized him as the exact counterpart of his uncle, a Virginia circuit rider.

The apparition also turned for a moment towards the men; then, regarding McAdams gravely, it beckoned once, and mounting the horse galloped slowly off down the draw.

When Mr. McAdams called for his mail at Blakeman he was handed a letter with a deep black border, postmarked at Three Rivers, Va. A portion of it read:

"Your Uncle John was called home. He was taken ill in prayermeeting and only lived a short time. He was unconscious to the last. He asked that his library be given to you, and his dying request was that you should become a minister of the Gospel and take up the work where he left off."

Resisting the Devil.

Some time ago, says a Scotch exchange, the Laird of Bansteerie lost his purse, which was discovered on the road-side by Daft Jamie, who called at the mansion house very early in the morning to hand over his find. The Laird, who had to be aroused out of his bed to receive, Jamie, was somewhat ill-natured, and asked him what the mischief sent him at such an early hour in the morning. "Well" replied Jamie, "I cam' awa' just as lang as I had the upper hand, for I can assure you the deevle an' me has had a gey nicht o't."

The plan is to establish at Pierre an industrial school for the entire Sioux nation."

A citizen of Brookings created a sensation recently by appearing on the streets disguised as a lank, cadaverous old man, with white hair and a bristling mustache seven inches long. The Madison Leader tells the following: "Ina Drake, of Badus, is the champion little plowgirl of Lake county. Little Ina possesses other accomplishments than being able to plow, and is said to be one of the nicest little ladies in the north part of the county."

Fifteen-Mile Guns.

Important experiments have been made at the Shoeburyness school of gunnery in high angle firing. A London correspondent of the Army and Navy Register writes: Probably no step of recent years is likely to lead to greater results, for if the experiment should be repeated with the same success, it is undeniable that war ships will have to be as fully protected on their decks as they now are on their broadsides. The experiments were made with the 9-inch or 23-centimetre gun used as a howitzer. An elevation of 37 degrees was given, and battering charges were used with Palliser shots. Out of four shots three fell within a space of 500 by 80 feet, representing the deck of a first-class ironclad, and the range attained was twelve miles!

My Poor Back!

That "poor back" is held responsible for more than its share of the sufferings of mankind. If your dog bites a man who kicks it, do you blame the dog? On the same principle the kidneys utter their protest against nervousness, impure blood, and resulting constipation. These force them to do extraordinary work in ridding the system of the poisons which are the result of effete matter retained in the blood. Then the sufferer says the back aches; the kidneys are diseased. "Not yet;" but they will be unless the nerves are strengthened, the blood purified, and the constipation removed. These are the causes of kidney troubles, and Paine's Celery Compound removes them quickly. With its tonic, purifying, and laxative effect, it also strengthens the weak kidneys, making it almost infallible in curing all diseases of the nerves and kidneys. If your hopes of cure have not been realized, try Paine's Celery Compound; it gives perfect health to all who complain of "their poor backs." Price $1.00.

Dear Sir—In April, 1885, while thinking of taking orders in September, I suddenly received notice that my ordination examination would be held in a fortnight. I had only ten (10) days in which to prepare for the Exam. I should recommend a year's preparation in the case of anyone so utterly unprepared as I was; but your system had so strengthened my natural memory, that I was able to remember and give the gist of any book after reading it once. I therefore read Lightfoot, Proctor, Harold, Browne, Mosheim, &c., &c., once, and was successful in every one of the nine papers. The present Bishop of Edinburg knows the facts. Faithfully yours.

MOUNT ARARAT

"Hold, I am not a coward, as you all will acknowledge since you know where I have traveled and where I am now on my way, but not for all the gold which these temples once contained would I ever undertake again to ascend Mount Ararat, the accursed mountain."

It was De Thou who was speaking to us—three of his friends who were seated with him one superb moonlight night among the ruins of the temples of Karnak, in upper Egypt. After a long ramble through those mute vestiges of the ancient civilization of the Pharaohs, we had all stretched ourselves on the warm sand that the winds of the desert had heaped among the stones, and each one seemed to have given himself up to his own special reveries. De Thou, whom a fortunate chance had added to our little company on the shores of the Nile when he was making his final preparations for a voyage through the country of the Gallas, had just come up to join us as he had promised. And it was he—this dauntless explorer of regions hitherto unknown; this tall, powerfully built fellow, six feet in his Moorish sandals of red leather, whose superb figure and proud bearing indicated no ordinary degree of energy, courage and daring, who was openly confessing to having been overcome by fear at least once in his life. It was certainly very strange, to say the least of it.

He slowly seated himself on a ruined column half buried in the sand, and as if the recollection of this adventure overcame him still, he began to relate it to us. All the surroundings were wonderfully in harmony with his narrative. Behind us, the majestic chaos of ruins; masses of marble jet black, and milky white, and around us the silence of that vast stretch of sand, only broken by the distant howl of the jackal and the hou hou of the owl.

I had just been through the whole Turco-Russian campaign in Asia Minor, and many a time fought side by side with my friends the Georgians and the Kourdes. As soon as the war was ended I stopped for a time in Bayazed. One day, I do not know why, this Collossus of the Caucus, whose snowy summit rose before me, and on which I had been gazing incessantly, seemed to exercise a perfect fascination over me, and I determined then and there to make the ascent. I have always been apt to yield to sudden impulses. I hurried to the pasha, governor of the town, to communicate my intention and ask his advice.

"Do not attempt it," he said. "That mountain is haunted by evil spirits; the Agri-Daugh devours the impious who dare to tread the green turf on its sides. But I know you, M. de Thon, and you will never give up this wild idea. If you will go, choose twenty of my best horsemen as an escort; they will accompany you to the foot of the mountain, if you desire it, but not the boldest among them would venture to set his foot on the side of the 'Mother of the World,' from whose black rocks even the birds flee in terror." I had already in my service the Albanian whom you have all seen on board my "dahabieh," and who would follow me into the very jaws of death. One day when his body was about to swing from the gibbet for one of those innumerable peccadilloes which cost a man's life in time of war, I had interceded for him and obtained his pardon. He swore eternal gratitude, and has shown himself ready to prove it by the willingness with which he has accompanied me in my perilous wanderings to the center of Africa. So I determined to start with Ali, and after a rough ride we reached the foot of Mount Ararat. The chief of the escort, who had frequently shaken his head in an ominous manner as we rode along, now quitted us without uttering a word to wait our return near Nakhitchevan, and we were left entirely alone. We had brought a plentiful supply of provisions. These I confided to a little shephard who was guarding his flock not far from us, and made him promise to keep them for us and meet us at the same place on our return in the evening. Then we started to make the ascent. Day was just breaking, the sky was pure, the atmosphere calm, and we were quite sure of being able to return by twilight. How shall I describe the ascent? Ararat is more than 15,000 feet high, and often as we came upon the scoria of its eruptions we seemed to be advancing to the assault of bare and tottering walls, which crumbled in fragments at our feet. Still we got along bravely, triumphing over innumerable difficulties, and we finally drew near the summit. Nevertheless, by this time the sun had already passed its zenith. During our journey we had gradually exhausted the stock of provisions which we carried in our pockets, and to enable us to struggle against the fatigue and giddiness consequent upon the ascent we had emptied the last drop in our gourd. I was about to give the order to start on our return, when my Albanian, who for some minutes had seemed very nervous and disturbed as he scanned the soil closely, suddenly exclaimed:

"Master, where are the stones?"

"What stones do you mean?"

"Why, the stones that we could see above us, from where we were standing a few minutes ago. Those on which Noah's ark rested during the deluge—where are they?"

"You are crazy, Ali. Do you not see that they are covered by a hundred feet of snow? Come, don't stop to think about that—come, let us hurry to begin our descent, or night will overtake us, and I see clouds gathering on the plain below."

"That is very unfortunate," replied he, "but we ought to be able to see those stones. Woe to him who climbs so high on this mountain and fails to touch with his hand the sacred rock from whence life descended again upon the earth."

By this time a piercing, icy wind began to blow.

It now seemed to me at each step that my feet were weighted down with hundred pound weights; there was a ringing in our ears, our breath came in quick gasps, and it was evident that we must descend as quickly as possible to avoid suffocation from the rarefaction of the air. For awhile we proceeded without a pause. We descended the slopes of glaciers and stepped over the ridges of obsidian, shining and slippery as glass, but soon the clouds enveloped us, and we entirely lost our bearings. Stumbling along the steep ridges of the cone, we continued our descent in a zigzag fashion, while the sun sank lower and lower in the horizon. Finally we emerged from the fog; patches of snow alternated with masses of blackened rock. We were now in a ravine which we were compelled to cross. Suddenly my companion stopped. "Master, look towards the center, on that table of granite; there is some one there. Let us ask him the way."

I advanced a few steps, but what I beheld made the hair on my head fairly bristle with horror. Yes, in the center of the granite table a human form was crouching in the shadow. A guant and hideous old man three times the size of any living man. In his immense crooked fingers he clutched a whole quarter of a sheep, raw and bleeding, which he was devouring. The blood ran in streams along his bony arms and dripped upon his knees. A frightful smile distorted his face. It was evident that Ali saw this gigantic phantom as well as myself, for he had turned as pale as a sheet; his hand clutched convulsively the carbine, which until this moment had been slung to his belt. I had not strength to address this grisly specter, though Ali did not give me time to do so. I saw him raise his carbine to his shoulder, and the report rang through the air, repeated a hundred times by the echo in the ravine. But the specter did not stir; he seemed only to devour his repast more greedily than before.

"Fire again, Ali! Fire for our lives!" A second bullet whistled through the air. I snatched the carbine from his hand. I took aim—once—twice—thrice—and each time as if fascinated I advanced several paces, as I saw that my bullets met no resistance, but went through empty air. Finally, beside myself with terror, I flung my carbine to the earth, drew my saber, and springing on the first shelf of the table rock, where the old man was still seated devouring his hideous repast—when—oh! my friends—oh, Heaven! I shall never forget the horror of that moment—the old man slowly turned his head, his beard stained with blood, and fixed on me his cavernous, deep set eyes, whose orbits gleamed like coals of fire."

Here De Thon, who seemed to live over again this frightful episode of his life, leaned forward on the stone pillar. He went through the whole scene. His hands were clenched, the veins in his neck swollen to bursting, while the pale moonlight of the tropics seemed to magnify his figure gestures. In the silence of the desert his voice, half stifled with emotion, made us shudder. The terrible vision seemed actually to pass before our eyes.

"Then, my friends," he continued, "a nameless terror froze my blood. I could not meet this infernal gaze, and I started down the slope at full speed. Springing over masses of stone, wounding myself against jagged points of rock, while my faithful and terrified companion followed me, invoking Allah in breathless, incoherent phrases. How long this flight continued before we came to our senses I cannot tell. Only the faint light of the rapidly sinking sun showed us the inextricable labyrinth through which we were wandering. A burning thirst consumed me, which I could only try to quench with a few handfuls of melting snow, mixed with earth. When I recovered myself a little, I concluded that I had been the victim of an hallucination induced by fatigue and by the hunger and thirst which had tortured me for so many hours, and the horror of feeling that we had lost our way. But then, why should my faithful Ali have had the same fear, and why should it have manifested itself by exactly the same visions? I made up my mind that whatever happened, or whatever vision might cross my path, that I would not betray my perception of them by word or sign.

Our route now seemed every moment to become more dreary, gloomy and monotonous; we were utterly worn out; we went along like automatons, stumbling through the last gorges which separated us from the plain below, and from safety. Suddenly we found ourselves in the bottom of a small extinct crater, and I saw advancing toward us a troop of horsemen. They were riding at full gallop, wheeling abruptly to avoid the points of rock, and sweeping in a circle round and round the edge of the crater. Their horses, white with foam, bounded over the heaps of basalt; thousands of fiery sparks flew from their hoofs, and each cavalier carried a long slender lance, which was aimed at me. This must be an hallucination, since Ali sees nothing, I said to myself, when suddenly at one of the innumerable charges of my enemies, Ali drew his saber and flung himself in front of me to cover my body from the lance. Doubt was no longer possible. The faithful fellow had been watching these horsemen, but, like myself, he had determined to say nothing; but his devotion had overpowered his will.

"Save yourself, my master! Death to the Kourdes! Seize your poniard or we are lost."

A blood red mist passed before my eyes. I bounded forward and struck wildly with my dagger. I tried to defend myself, but I felt a sharp, cold steel pierce my side, and as darkness came on I found myself stretched, exhausted and bleeding, on the plain, with a deep wound in my side. Who dealt this wound? Could I have done it myself in my efforts at self-defense—or was it the vengeance of the Agri-Dah? I shall never know. But one thing is certain—while this scar throbs in my flesh, I swear by the Heaven that looks down on us tonight, that never, never more will I attempt to set foot on the accursed mountain.—George Kohn in Detroit Free Press.

"Women Who go to College."

Under the above title Arthur Gilman writes in the September Century: "I have been told, even in cultivated, intellectual circles, that a young woman had better be in the kitchen or laundry than in the laboratory or class-room of a college. 'Women should be trained,' such persons say, 'to be wives and mothers.' The finger of scorn has been lightly pointed at the mentally cultivated mothers and daughters who are unable to cook an l scrub, who cannot make a mince pie or a plum-pudding. Such persons forget with surprising facility all the cases of women who neglect the kitchen to indulge in the love-sick sentimentality to which they have been trained; who think too much of possible matrimonial chances to endanger them by scrubbing, or by giving ground for the suspicion that they cultivate any other faculty than the power to apostophize the moonlight and to long for a lover. They do not care to remember that it is no whit better to wither under the influence of ignorance of sentiment, to cultivate a fondness for 'gush,' then to dry up the sensibilities like a book-worm, or grow rigid and priggish as a pedant. It is as bad to stunt human nature as to over-stmulate it—to stop its progress in one way as in another. The mass of men choose the golden mean, and we may trust women to avoid extravagance in the pursuit of learning. We may and ought to give her every help in the direction of life that her brothers possess. It is no longer doubtful, it is plain, that whatever other rights women should have, those of the intellectual kingdom ought to be hers fully and freely. She should be the judge herself of how far she should go in exploring the mysteries of nature and of science.

A Nun Married.

A former sister of the third Order of St. Dominic was married at the residence of the Rev. Father Malone, pastor of Saints Peter and Paul's church, in Brooklyn. The New York Times says: In religion her name was Sister St. Mary, in the world it was Miss Mary Julia Holly, now it is Mrs. Antoine Betz. Her husband is a good-looking young German, who now works at Havemeyer's sugar refinery. The Rev. Dr. Smith performed the ceremony. Mrs. Betz came to this country five years ago from Munich and entered the convent of the Sisters of St. Dominic. After becoming a nun she was sent to St. Catharine's Hospital. Betz drove an Ambulance for the hospital and left there one day last June. Sister St. Mary was found to have deserted the hospital and her nun's raiment the next day. The Third Order of St. Dominic is not a cloistered sisterhood. Mrs. Betz said that she had taken her vows for three years. Father Malone and the Rev. Dr. Smith said that they had not been informed of her leaving the convent. The names of the couple had been handed in and called twice from the altar in the regular way. Nobody offered any objection to the bans.

The Population of India.

The statistical abstract of India which has just been issued contains an estimate of the present population of India. According to the census of 1881, the population of British territory was 198,790,853, and of the native states 55,191,742, giving a total of 253,982,595. The estimated population of Cashmere (which was not included in the census) in 1873 was 1,500,000; of Upper Burmah in 1886, 3,000,000, and of the Burmese Shan states, 2,000,000. The yearly increment of the population is at least ½ per cent. With these additions, and with allowances for annual increments since the census of February, 1881, the population of India in March, 1887, would be: British territory, 207,754,578; the native states, 60,382,466; giving a total population for all India of 268,137,044. Both in Britain and the native states the number of males is much larger than that of females. In 1881 in British territory there were 101.2 males to 97.4 females, and in the natiue states 28.7 males to 26.4 females, and in all India there were in that year just 6,013,410 more males than females.

A Marriage Certificate as a Warrant.

From the Kennebec Journal.

Our veracious city clerk vouches for the following: About two years ago a resident of that city, filled with good spirit, called and desired that his name and that of a China lady be published. A few months after he called around for the certificate, and, after bracing up his courage by imbibing heavily, started for the residence of a justice of the peace. On his arrival he informed the justice that he desired to be married. "Wall," he said, in a hesitating sort of way, "I haven't just been able to get the old woman started, but I've got this here paper" (brandishing the certificate), "and if you'll hitch up your team and serve it on her, why she's got to come." It is needless to say that the ceremony has not yet been performed.

It's terrible!" exclaimed an old lady, upon reading of a premature burial; "and I know that when I die I'll be worrying all the time I'm in the grave for fear I have been buried alive."

A LESSON TO LOVERS.

"From all that I have read and heard," said young Dr. Newberry gravely, "the great bane of happiness of lovers, whether engaged or married, is lack of perfect frankness and confidence between them. Should anything arise to excite doubt or jealousy in either party, an explanation should be at once sought and given, and thus frequently much trouble and unnappiness be avoided."

"I perfectly agree with you," replied Josie Chase, looking up brightly. "And so there will never be any danger of our misunderstanding each other, will there!"

"I hope not, darling," he replied.

And then thee was some little ecstatic demonstration, such as youthful lovers are privileged to indulge in when alone.

They had been but three days engaged and had known each other not quite three months—only since the young doctor had come to Woodleigh to commence practice.

Josie was the belle of the town, and it had not been without a struggle that the young doctor had won her in face of richer and, as some people considered, more desirable suitors.

She was very pretty and clever, and full of warm-hearted and generous impulses, and also, if the doctor's landlady was to be credited, somewhat fond of having her own way.

"Seeing she's an only child," said Mrs. Larrimer, who had five grown daughters of her own, "she's well nigh spoiled to death. Her ma lets her have her own way, and though her pa sometimes worries about her odd doings, she generally manages to bring him around in the end.

"She's such a flirt!" exclaimed Miss Blossom Larrimer, who, though the eldest of the cluster of five sisters, still languished ungathered upon the parent stem. "Why, I couldn't tell the men she has led on to propose, and then discarded. It's dreadfully heartless and cruel!" she added with a sympathetic sigh.

"Oh, you had better leave the doctor to find out all that for himself!" giggled Miss Gay, the youngest of the five. "Only, Doctor, you mustn't blame us for letting you be caught in a man-trap. We've warned you. He, he!"

"The last one," said Mrs. Larrimer, solemnly, "was that wild young fellow, Jack Ripley, whom they turned out of Rattlepan College for whitewashing the president's horse and other lawless doings. He used to visit Miss Josephine while he was here at the college, about two years ago, and just before you came to Woodleigh he was back again and the two were thicker than ever. Some folks thought it would be a match, but it seems her pa interfered and sent him off. I must say she changes mighty easy from one to another. I'd be sorry to have one of my girls act like that!"

These accounts at first set the Doctor to thinking a little; but he was not to be frightened from his wooing; and in his happiness as an accepted lover he forgot all the warnings and croakings of the Larrimer family.

He knew that his Josie was a little coquettish—a little vain it might be—as what pretty woman is not? But that she was either heartless or fickle he would not believe.

And it was not until farther confidential revelations from the indefatigable Mrs. Larrimer that an uneasy feeling of doubt and perplexity began to take possession of his mind.

"Ahem!" said the lady, as she handhim a second cup of tea, when one evening he had come rather late from a professional call. "So Jack Ripley is back again in Woodleigh. What do you think of him, Dr. Newberry?"

"I have not had the pleasure of meeting him."

"No? Dear me! that seems strange when—when you are both so much at the Chases'. He was there yesterday, again this morning and this evening. As they live nearly opposite us, some of us couldn't help seeing him go in and out. But, of course you've heard Miss Josie mention him?"

No: the Doctor had not heard anyone mention Jack Ripley. And he thought it rather strange that if that gentleman had really come again a-wooing Miss Josephine Chase, she should have permitted him to pay her these visits—she was his affianced wife.

As usual, when he was not professionally engaged, he went after tea to see Josie. It was a warm moonlight summer night; the parlor was unoccupied and close, and the Doctor, while waiting for his betrothed, took his seat at a side window—a window which opened upon the pretty garden, and through which came a soft, refreshing breeze, laden with the perfume of roses.

In fact, just beneath this window was what Josie called her rose arbor—a trellis covered with a running rose bush, where only last night he had set with her in the moonlight and talked over their plans of future happiness.

He had noticed at the time that she appeared a little absent and disinclined to talk. Could it have been on account of this visit of Mr. Jack Ripley? And now, as the thought occurred, he became aware of low voices in the arbor. Before he could rise and move away these words, in Josie's voice, slightly raised, came distinctly to his ear:

"I tell you Jack, no one suspects us. But you come too often to the house. You must keep away, and this must positively be your last visit before—"

Her voice sank and the rest was inaudible. But a reply came in a man's tones—low and tender and pleading.

"You are sure that you will not fail me at the last—that I may trust implicitly to your promise?"

Then more murmurings; only broken sentences came to the ear of the unconsciously spell-bound listner.

"What would the Doctor say if he knew this?"

"Why, I think he would not exactly approve," came in Josie's laughing voice; "but so long as I am unmarried I have a right to consult my own inclination. As to papa, he will be angry with us, of course, but only for a time. You will yet see him with his benevolent face glowing with a smile of satisfaction, while he spreads out his dear pudgy hands, and says: 'Bless you my children!'"

And they both laughed.

Just then a servant's voice was heard:

"Miss Josie! You're wanted in the parlor, miss."

There was a sudden rustling of the roses as the girl sprang up.

"Remember, Jack, to-morrow evening at 8 precisely. Can you see the dress I have on—brown over a striped underskirt? Well, it will be this dress and a thick brown veil. And you must be standing exactly by that poplar tree I showed you. Good-by! You had better leave by the garden gate instead of going into the house!"

Then the doctor regained sufficient presence of mind to move away and seat himself as far as possible from the open window.

Josie came in flushed, excited, and, despite her evident effort to appear as usual, shy and constrained.

The doctor did not remain long. He felt too shocked and wounded to know exactly what course to pursue in this sudden and unexpected state of things.

He would go home and think it over. And the result of his thinking was, that he concluded to say nothing to Josephine just now, but to watch her movements the next evening and find something more definite by which to shape his course.

It was a little past 7 o'clock the next evening when, watching from his office window he saw Josephine trip lightly down the steps of her father's house, attired in the brown and striped dress, and a little hat, around which was tied a brown veil.

He saw her face before she pulled the folds of the veil close, and even caught her glance as she looked shyly over towards his office, as if fearful of being seen by him. Then she walked on very fast, while he followed at a safe distance.

She went first to a house in which he knew a sister of her father resided—Miss Almeria Chase—a well-to-do maiden lady whose prim and severe aspect he had never liked.

Here she remained about half an hour, then reappeared, walking hurriedly as before, and taking her way not homeward, but toward the suburbs of the town.

Entering a sort of lane or narrow road, with a thick hedge on one side, she came in sight of a poplar tree at the turn of the lane. Here a man was standing—a tall, handsome young fellow—who, on seeing her, came hastily forward and received her, apparently half fainting, in his arms.

At the same moment he made a signal, and a carriage, until now hidden by the turn of the lane came up.

The two hurriedly entered it and they drove away at a rapid pace. They were clearly going to catch the north-bound train at the nearest station.

The doctor, although he now understood the plan, made no motion or attempt to oppose it.

"If she prefers him to me, let her go," he said, and, in forlorn wretchedness and bitterness of soul, returned to his office.

The Chase house opposite was shut up and the windows closed, as though its life and light had forever departed.

Did the parents know as yet what had happened? Should he break it to them—more gently, perhaps, than others would do, and in their woe find some soothing for his own?

He walked slowly up the front steps to the porch, and there lingered. He could not find it in his heart to enter the house where her presence was no longer, and it was with an effort that he gave the bell knob a pull which seemed like the wrenchings of his own heartstrings.

The door was instantly opened, and turning he beheld Josie standing sullenly before him.

"I have been expecting you for more than an hour," she said. "But," catching sight of his pale and startled face, "what is the matter? Are you ill?"

"No; but I—I don't understand. I did not expect to see you. I thought you had gone away."

"Gone away?"

"Yes—with Jack Ripley," he said sternly.

And Josie, to his surprise, broke into a laugh.

Then, changing, she became very grave and dignified.

"How could you have had such a thought of me; Charlie?"

"Josie, was it you whom I saw leave the house about 7 o'clock this evening wearing a brown dress and veil?"

"Yes, certainly!"

"And you met a gentleman in the popular lane—"

"No, no!" she interrupted, again laughing. "That was my cousin, May Harding—Aunt Almerin's niece. We are of the same size and exchanged dresses in order to deceive aunt's watchful eyes. But come in and let me tell you all about it. I could not before, being bound to secrecy."

And then she told him how Jack and May had for years loved each other, and been kept apart by Miss Chase, who had taken charge of May when a child, and been to her a domestic tyrant.

Whenever Jack was in town Miss Chase kept a double watch upon the poor girl, and it was only by the scheme which had been so successful that May was enabled to elude her argus eye and get safely away with her lover.

Papa had always been in favor of the match, but for peace's sake did not like to interfere with his sister Almeria.

"He will scold a little when he finds out my part in it," Josie said, "but will be delighted, all the same, "that May is happy at last. No one could ever say a word against Jack except that he was a little wild and mischevious at college; but he has sobered now, and just settled down to the practice of law. And as to whether Dr. Newberry will blame me—"

She paused, and looked up half archly, half inquiringly into his face.

"No, darling—not now," he answered; "although you have caused me the most miserable hours of my life."

"Charlie," she said, softly, as she allowed him to draw her gently toward him, "if you had practiced your own theory and sought an explanation of what appeared to you so suspicious, you would have been spared those miserable hours."

"Yes, darling, it was my fault. But this may serve us both for a lesson to begin with."—Saturday Night.

The Too Faithful Butler.

From the Liverpool Courier

A queer episode in Connaught life was the case of Dennis Bodkin versus Patrick French. The plaintiff and defendant were neighbors. The latter was of the "ouldshtock," full of airs, and possessed of an intolerable temper. He and wife had conceived a deep dislike for Mr. Bodkin, who entertained an equal aversion to the Frenches. Bodkin happened one day to give particular offense to the squire and lady. That evening they entertained a large company at dinner, when Mrs. French launched out in abuse of her enemy, concluding her wish "that somebody would cut off the fellow's ears, and that might quiet him."

The subject was changed after a while, and all went on well till supper, at which time, when everybody was happy, the old butler, one Ned Regan, who, according to custom, had drunk enough, came in. Joy was in his eye, and whispering something to his mistress which she did not comprehend, he put a large snuff-box into her hand. Fancying it was some whim of her old servant she opened the box and shook out its contents, when lo! a pair of bloody ears dropped out on the table. The horror of the company was awakened, upon which old Ned exclaimed: "Sure, my lady, you wished that Dennis Bodkin's ears were cut off, so I told old Geeghegan, the gamekeeper, and he took a few handy boys with him and brought back his ears and here they are, and I hope you are pleased, my lady."

The gamekeeper and the "boys" left the country. French and his wife were held in heavy bail at the Galway assizes, but the guests proved no such order was given; that it was a mistake on the part of the servant. They were acquitted. The "boys" and their leader never reappeared in the county until after the death of Bodkin, who lost his ears many years before his death.

Tricks in Photography.

"There are various ways for providing surprising results in photography, things that in one age would have been called magic, but in ours recognized as scientific tricks. The ghost picture, for instance, in which a shadowy ghost—through which material objects are visible—is seen between natural attitudes and occupations. That is produced by an almost instantaneous exposure of the figure that is to do duty as the ghost, followed by a full exposure of the figures and properties that are to appear natural. Another novel trick was shown recently in a photograph reproduced by a prominent trade journal, which presented the photographer, seated at a table playing chess, with himself sitting on the opposite side of the table, while he himself, stood up in the background looking at his two selves playing. The figures were all on the negative, which was produced by three success exposures of the plate, parts thereof being masked each time by a black velvet shutter. Still another trick is that by which a person who like that sort of thing may appear to be photographed riding upon a flying goose, or a fish, or any other desired style or ridiculous locomotion. This is done by the subject holding upon his lap a huge piece of white or sky-tinted card with the funciful figure drawn upon it. His face appears above the uper edge of the card and seems, in the picture, joined to the funny little body mounted on the goose or fish. The statute picture is made by about the same device. But none of these, or any other ingenious trick yet inveted, will enable a rascal to make a picture of a girl without her complicity, so that its fraudulent character cannot be detected."

An Embarrassed Clergyman.

An amusing incident happened at the recent Sam Jones tabernacle meeting at Catersville. One of the most devout ministers of North Georgia, who resides in a town not a thousand miles from Catersville, left home to spend a day or two at these meetings. The sudden cool weather that came about during the meeting caused overcoats to become a requisite. The clergyman alluded to did not have his overcoat along, but the family whom he was stopping with kindly tendered one which answered every purpose. After securing a seat up near the pulpit the minister proceeded to take off his overcoat, and while doing so a deck of cards fell from a side pocket as he was folding the coat to hang it on the back of his chair. To see the minister, who for many years had been engaged in making such a crusade against cards, reaching after a ten-spot here and a jack of spades there and hiding them away as fast as he could get them back into his pocket certainly created a ripple among those seated near him.—Savannah News.

A Reporter's Revenge.

From the Liverpool Post.

Notice had been taken of the Duke of Cambridge's visit to Liverpool, but one remarkable episode of that visit is now nearly forgotten. A newspapar man who was then in Liverpool gave a graphic description of it the other night. The Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Cadwell and several other distinguished men to dine with the mayor at Town Hall. Their speeches were expected to be of European importance, and great interest attached to the occasion. Owing to the great attendance the mayor could find room for only one reporter. There was much protest on the part of the press, but it was of no avail. An expert reporter named Murphy was selected for the work, and arrangements were made to supply all England with the report which he was to dictate. But Mr. Murphy was treated which the utmost discourtesy by the town hall officials. He was placed apart from the guests in an orchestra occupied by the fiddlers.

He took his revenge when he returned to the office where a dozen reporters were awating him, he smiled benignantly upon them and told them to go home. "Go home!" "What do you mean? Have you got the report?" "I have taken down every syllable," said the redoubtable Murphy "here are my notes," slapping his pocketbook, "and there they remain. I have been grossly insulted, and not a line of the speeches shall ever see print." He was as good as his word, and so far as England and the world were concerned, the great men at the town hall might as well have uttered their words of wisdom, congratulation, and warning in a thunderstorm from the top of Snowdon,

"The truth in masquerade" is Byron's term for a lie. But it is the truth, and no masquerade, that Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup cures coughs and colds. No cure so speedy. Price twenty-five cents.

If you should have a lame horse, and have used every remedy without success, invest twenty-five cents in a bottle of Salvation Oil. It will cure him.

Charles Johnson was hanged at Waterloo, N. Y., for the murder of John Walters last January. Two men, Charles Johnson and Caldwell, were confined in the Waterloo jail awaiting trial on the charge of horse stealing. The guard, John Walters, went to the cell where the two men were, when Johnson hit him on the head with a stove shaker and fractured his skull. Walters lingered some days and then died. Cadwell was tried and sentenced to Auburn for life.

The ceremony of unveiling the Seward statue took place at Auburn, N. Y., in the presence of a large concourse of people, including many distinguished guests from out of town. The W. H. Seward Republican club of New York came in a body. The statue is of bronze, and rises from a pedestal nine feet in height, the figure of Seward being just one-half larger than life size. It represents him standing in act of delivering his famous higher law sentiment, his right foot extended, his right hand impressively pointing heavenward. With the pedestal its height from the ground is eighteen feet. The sculptor is Walter E. Robinson of Auburn, who was present.

Glad It Was No Worse.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The state central committee of the prohibition party has issued an address to the third party voters of the state congratulating them upon the result, thanking them for their support and exhorting them to persevere. The congratulations, in view of the fact that the third party vote did not reach much above half the figure at which it was estimated by third party leaders before the election, are doubtless intended to be taken upon the fact that the outcome is no worse than it is.

The exhortation to continued effort in behalf of the third party might be regarded as plucky and even if it were not for the pious cant about the Christian example of those who with "hands lifted up in prayer voted for the continuance of the licensed dramshop policy." This Pharasaical, holier-than-thou attitude of the third party seems to stick to it under all circumstances.

"And now fellow-workers," continues the address, "move on. Drop all recriminations, bury all differences and move on the common foe. We are on the road to success and need only to press forward to victory." On the road to success! It must be a long route that these "reformers" have chosen. Gen. Fisk is their fourth presidential candidate and they have not yet elected a single state officer or member of congress. They have been trying for nearly twenty years to make some impression on the country, and in that effort have latterly thrown their main strength against the republican party, with the result that that party is stronger to-day than it has been since the third party took for its war cry the death of the republican.

What can this mean except that practical people are not to be deceived by a handful of sentimental, hysterical enthusiasts into the abandonment of practical temperance measures for the sake of demonstrating the worthlessness and impracticability of the third party scheme by adopting it before public sentiment demands it and will sustain it? Prohibition is the ultimate result. The drinking saloon is doomed, but it is not the third party that is bringing about that fact. It has never passed a prohibitory law and probably never will. It is the education of the people on its evil effects upon society and upon the individual that is responsible for the prevailing and growing sentiment against the saloon. Unquestionably the people who compose the third party are entitled to part of the credit for creating this sentiment, but they do not need a third party for that purpose. Indeed, the third party has been a detriment by separating them from the main body of the temperance people of the country and by dividing forces that should be united.

THE DULUTH & WINNIPEG.

The Officials Pleased with Their Tour of Inspection.

DULUTH, Nov. 13.—General Manager Fisher, Director C. W. Wells and Chief Engineer Morris, of the Duluth & Winnipeg, are making a tour over the line as far as completed. Mr. Fisher is as enthusiastic as ever regarding the future of the road and is much pleased with the work that is now being done by the contractors. He states that the operations are being pushed as rapidly as possible; that the weather has been very favorable as a whole, but that the approach of cold weather will not have the effect of a drawback to the work to any great extent. Supplies for the line are being pushed forward rapidly, and while he did not know the exact force at work it was near 1,000 men. Running arrangements will be made over the St. Paul & Duluth road into the city for the first, but the Winnipeg will never be content until it has its own line all the way in, and this will come after the less expensive portions of the road have been built. The officers of the road have made no sales or have entered into no negotiations for sale with any outside corporations, and though they could do so at any time with profit, they have not the remotest intention of so doing. The prospects of the road as a business enterprise are too bright for such ideas to find ground. Mr. Fisher leaves in a short time for the East on business connected with the road and on his return the construction will be pushed faster than ever.

"It is a Waterloo."

Toledo Blade.

The Detroit Evening News is a free trade and independent democratic paper. It is editorially one of the strongest papers in the west, and is not afraid to face the logic of any political situation and tell the truth, as it sees it, about the matter. Its discussion of the results of the election is eminently worth reading. It declares that "it is a Waterloo," and says:

"It is not merely a battle lost, or a campaign gone wrong. It was an irreparable disaster on the very point of a victory almost achieved that would have given the mastery of a continent for a generation. * *

Napoleon was not crushed at Waterloo merely because the darkness did not come before Blucher came. It was the weight of united Europe that crushed him, and it was the weight of the united north that crushed Cleveland and the democratic party. Yesterday was the supplement of Appomattox. The democracy had taken desperate chances in its play for empire, and was depending on the solid south and a single trick, New York.

Its rule was the rule of the south, which depended upon it to regain the power it had lost by the sword. It had no assured footing in any northern state, not even in New York, where its only chance depended upon the mob of one great city. It has unfortunately for the noble principles which it represented, remained a southern party, and it has now shared the fate of the confederacy, with whose elements it has been in alliance.

There were those who thought Napoleon had a chance after Waterloo, and there will be democrats who will hope for a revival of their party.

Let these consider the situation. The republican party now returns to power with a wisdom born of painful experience. Like the Holly Alliance at Vienna, they will make assurance doubly sure by a radical reconstruction of the political map. The admission of North and South Dakota, Washington, Wyoming, and Idaho—and this will be done at once—will give them ten additional United States senators, and about 25 additional members o the house, making the old game of their enemy—New York and the solid south—an impossibility. They will inaugurate a vigorous foreign policy, that will in all probability result in the annexation of Canada, and the addition of five or six more northern states.

These great movements will fill the popular imagination to the exclusion of economic questions, while any serious demands for fiscal reform can be contented with some slight abatement of taxation. They can thus make it absolutely impossible for a full generation to come, for any party identified with the solid south to attain power. The solid south itself, always politically wise in its generation, seeing no hope through the democracy, will break up. Its old whig elements will come to the front again, and make alliances with the party which can alone give them a share of power." * *

There is a good deal of prophecy in all this, and it will be worth while to see how far wrong the News is in its calculations.

Thanksgiving Day.

Gov. McGill yesterday issued his annual Thanksgiving proclamation as follows:

Pursuant to law and a custom much honored in the observance, I do hereby set apart and appoint Thursday the 29th day of November, instant, "as a day of solemn and public thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessings to us as a state and nation," and I recommend its observance by religious, family reunions and a general cessation from business.

While there is cause for great thankfulness in the general prosperity prevailing throughout the state, we have nevertheless our unfortunate poor, to whom the appointment of a thanksgiving day, in view of their want and poverty, seems but a hollow mockery, In behalf of these I appeal to the rich and those blessed with abundance, and ask of them the practice of that Christian precept, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." I sincerely hope that on Thanksgiving day, at least, no Minnesota home will lack the cheer and comfort of plenty. Let the day be signalized by good deed noble and generously done.

"If there be among you a poor man within any of thy gates in thy land, thou shalt not harden thy heart nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother, but thou shalt open thine hand wide to him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him, because for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto."

"Like a beautiful flower, full of color and full of perfume, are the fruitful words of him who acts accordingly.

It is hereby ordered that the capitol shall be closed, and no public business transacted in any of the departments or offices of the state on the day herein designated as Thanksgiving day.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the state to be affixed at the capitol in the city of St. Paul this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight.

A. R. McGILL

By the governor:

H. MATTSON. Secretary of States.

Out in The Cold.

Warren Sheaf.

That is about the condition of the inhabitants of Northern Minnesota under the present arrangement of the St. P., M. & M. R'y. Since Sunday last the through passenger trains from St. Paul to Winnipeg, have gone via Grand Forks and the West side of the river to Winnipeg, leaving a mixed train on this side. No fault can be found with the arrival and departure of the mails, and we fully realize the fact that all long railroad lines the trains must be at some stations in inconvenient hours, but when the patrons of a road that is doing the amount of business that the road between Crookston and St. Vincent is doing, it shoved off with a cattle train with two dirty, stinking low grade smoking coaches and those left a half mile back from the station while the engine is doing 15 to 20 minutes switching and hen when they do run making a time of about 12 to 15 miles an hour, or average time, including stops, of perhaps 10 miles an hour, the citizens receive this part of the arrangement as a gross insult and with great indignation and there is not the least doubt that unless better accommodations are made for the traveling public of Northern Minnesota they will make a grand kick and if the Northern Pacific or some other company should run another road into this section there is no doubt the Manitoba would be left as completely in the cold as we are now.

Result of Third Party Action.

New York Tribune.

The third party prohibitionists in this state must be proud of their work this week. They could not succeed in defeating General Harrison. All that they had the strength to do was to beat Warner Miller and elect in his stead the favorite son of the saloons, and put off for three years the adoption of a high license law, with its inevitable diminution of drunkenness and crime. For a large part of the criminality' profligacy, drunkenness and taxes of this state during the next three years the third party prohibitionists will be directly responsible. This is a proud record for a temperance party.

It will be observed, as the smoke of the conflict clears away, that the efforts of the republican party for the cause of temperance cost it heavily, especially in the three doubtful Eastern states. The professed friends of temperance did not fail, by means of separate tickets, to defeat Mr. Miller in this state and Mr. Phelps in New Jersey, and they served, the liquor interest so well in the latter state that a democratic legislature will now have power to repeal local option and license law. In one democratic county, where prohibition was recently voted by a large majority, two liquor-sellers have been elected to the legislature, in part by the votes of the very democrats who voted for prohibition. These voters cared for temperance a little, for democracy a great deal, and for consistency not at all. But the responsibility of dealing with the liquor question will now rest with the democratic party in that state, and to a democratic Governor the votes of the people have given power to veto temperance measures in New York. The republican party has the satisfaction of having made a brave, honest and manly effort, which, it appears, the voters were not sufficiently in favor of temperance to sustain.

A Political Revolution.

Toledo Blade.

The presidential election is a political revolution. Harrison and Morton have carried all the "sure republicans states"—those which cast their votes for James G. Blaine in 1884—and have, besides carried New York, Indiana and West Virginia.

The republicans win, and would have won even had New York cast her electoral vote for Cleveland. The "sure republican states," plus Indiana and West Virginia, cast 203 electoral votes, which gives a majority of 2 over the 201 required to elect, New York's 36 electoral votes swell the republican total to 239.

New York was not the pivotal state of the campaign, after all. Harrison does not depend for his triumph upon a fluke, as did Cleveland in 1884. New York is a big state, and the republicans did noble work, but her position as a political pivot in presidential years is gone by. The star of empire moves westward, and with the growing commonwealths of the northwest admitted as states, New York loses her primacy.

Harrison and Morton carry every Northern state, except New Jersey and Connecticut. Cleveland did not even get the solid south, for West Virginia stepped over into the republican column. The solid south is broken.

The next house of representatives will had a good working majority. It looks now as though it will stand 173 republicans to 155 democrats. The house will then be republican for the first time since March 4, 1883.

The senate, which is now so nearly a tie, will have its republican majority increased, the latest estimate being 40 republicans and 36 democrats.

With both branches of congress and a republican president, the reactionary schemes of the free trade democracy will be utterly ineffectual, and the wheels of national progress and development can not be blocked. The fifty-first congress will have much important work to do.

It will revise the tariff on protective lines and get rid of the surplus.

It will admit north and south Dakota, Washington, Idaho and probably Montana, to the sisterhood of states, thus doing justice to those territories, the leading ones of which should have been admitted two or three years ago, but were kept out for partisian purposes by a democratic house.

It will have control of the census of of 1890, and will decide upon the basis of representation to be in force for the next decade.

It will settle the southern question—and settle it permanently, we hope, so that men will not hold seats in congress to represent voters who do not dare go to the ballot box.

It is a political revolution. The gloomy forebodings of thousands of republicans who feared that the democrats would so strongly intrench themselves in power that they could not be dislodged, are shown to be without adequate foundation. That party has the faculty, whenever intrusted with power, of committing some blunder that disgusts the people and overthrows its supremacy. The free trade policy was the blunder this year.

There is some delightful literature about the Indians in the November Wide Awake. The appeal to the children to build the dining room of the Ramona Industrial School at Santa Fe is repeated, and a list of those who have contributed the last month is published—about one-twentieth of the needed sum is already raised. Then there is a most touching true story by Margaret Owen Foster, entitled "The Little Captive Chief." The incident happened in Oregon about thirty years ago; it shows how completely the Indian nature may be revolutionized by life among civilized people, and also how readily the civilized nature relapses when thrust back into barbarism and savagery. "An evening at Carlisle," by Miss Sparhawk, a teacher in the Indian school, describes an entertainment given by the Indian girls, and pleads eloquently for the education of all our young Indians. In Mrs. Upton's "Children of the White House," a fine chapter is given concerning 'The Household of John Quincy Adams," full of anecdote and fresh historical matter, and very valuable for its twenty-seven illustrations—many of them portraits wholly new to the public; the frontispiece is a bewitching full-length portrait of "The Dorothy Q. of To-Day," a great-great-great-granddaughter of President John Adams, and a relative and namesake of Dr. Holmes' "Dorothy Q." Another beautiful article is entitled "Some Children of Modern Painters," and gives reproductions of many exquisite childhood pictures by half a dozen eminent English and French painters. "The Wild Horseman, Count Chandor," is an account by Madame Radford de Meissner of the famous daring Hungarian Count and his horses, with interesting reproductions of some of the paintings of his exploits which hang in the Chandor Castl at Buda-Pesth. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop has a charming story called "A New Birthday." "Caught in a Snowstorm," by C. S. Messinger, will interest everybody—it is an exciting odventure of two children who went to see "The Mikado." The two serials, "Plucky Smalls" and "Double Roses" are concluded, to make way for a new "Peppers" serial by Margaret Sidney, and one of New England life by J. T. Trowbridge. Harran H. Ballard has a very instructive article on "Ye Knightly Game of Chess." There are many other good things; "Concerning Cats," by Miss Winslow, "Inside an Outline," "The Annals of Paul and Virginia," "Venesa Women," "Irish Crickets." "Who Bit the Blacksmith's Apron?" "Moon Pets," "The Little Rebel's Song," "Prize Questions," etc., etc. Wide Awake is $2.40 a year 30 cents a number. Sample back number 5 cents, or of the four Lothrop magazines for 15 cents. D. Glad It Was No Worse.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The state central committee of the prohibition party has issued an address to the third party voters of the state congratulating them upon the result, thanking them for their support and exhorting them to persevere. The congratulations, in view of the fact that the third party vote did not reach much above half the figure at which it was estimated by third party leaders before the election, are doubtless intended to be taken upon the fact that the outcome is no worse than it is.

The exhortation to continued effort in behalf of the third party might be regarded as plucky and even if it were not for the pious cant about the Christian example of those who with "hands lifted up in prayer voted for the continuance of the licensed dramshop policy." This Pharasaical, holier-than-thou attitude of the third party seems to stick to it under all circumstances.

"And now fellow-workers," continues the address, "move on. Drop all recriminations, bury all differences and move on the common foe. We are on the road to success and need only to press forward to victory." On the road to success! It must be a long route that these "reformers" have chosen. Gen. Fisk is their fourth presidential candidate and they have not yet elected a single state officer or member of congress. They have been trying for nearly twenty years to make some impression on the country, and in that effort have latterly thrown their main strength against the republican party, with the result that that party is stronger to-day than it has been since the third party took for its war cry the death of the republican.

What can this mean except that practical people are not to be deceived by a handful of sentimental, hysterical enthusiasts into the abandonment of practical temperance measures for the sake of demonstrating the worthlessness and impracticability of the third party scheme by adopting it before public sentiment demands it and will sustain it? Prohibition is the ultimate result. The drinking saloon is doomed, but it is not the third party that is bringing about that fact. It has never passed a prohibitory law and probably never will. It is the education of the people on its evil effects upon society and upon the individual that is responsible for the prevailing and growing sentiment against the saloon. Unquestionably the people who compose the third party are entitled to part of the credit for creating this sentiment, but they do not need a third party for that purpose. Indeed, the third party has been a detriment by separating them from the main body of the temperance people of the country and by dividing forces that should be united.

THE DULUTH & WINNIPEG.

The Officials Pleased with Their Tour of Inspection.

DULUTH, Nov. 13.—General Manager Fisher, Director C. W. Wells and Chief Engineer Morris, of the Duluth & Winnipeg, are making a tour over the line as far as completed. Mr. Fisher is as enthusiastic as ever regarding the future of the road and is much pleased with the work that is now being done by the contractors. He states that the operations are being pushed as rapidly as possible; that the weather has been very favorable as a whole, but that the approach of cold weather will not have the effect of a drawback to the work to any great extent. Supplies for the line are being pushed forward rapidly, and while he did not know the exact force at work it was near 1,000 men. Running arrangements will be made over the St. Paul & Duluth road into the city for the first, but the Winnipeg will never be content until it has its own line all the way in, and this will come after the less expensive portions of the road have been built. The officers of the road have made no sales or have entered into no negotiations for sale with any outside corporations, and though they could do so at any time with profit, they have not the remotest intention of so doing. The prospects of the road as a business enterprise are too bright for such ideas to find ground. Mr. Fisher leaves in a short time for the East on business connected with the road and on his return the construction will be pushed faster than ever.

"It is a Waterloo."

Toledo Blade.

The Detroit Evening News is a free trade and independent democratic paper. It is editorially one of the strongest papers in the west, and is not afraid to face the logic of any political situation and tell the truth, as it sees it, about the matter. Its discussion of the results of the election is eminently worth reading. It declares that "it is a Waterloo," and says:

"It is not merely a battle lost, or a campaign gone wrong. It was an irreparable disaster on the very point of a victory almost achieved that would have given the mastery of a continent for a generation. * *

Napoleon was not crushed at Waterloo merely because the darkness did not come before Blucher came. It was the weight of united Europe that crushed him, and it was the weight of the united north that crushed Cleveland and the democratic party. Yesterday was the supplement of Appomattox. The democracy had taken desperate chances in its play for empire, and was depending on the solid south and a single trick, New York.

Its rule was the rule of the south, which depended upon it to regain the power it had lost by the sword. It had no assured footing in any northern state, not even in New York, where its only chance depended upon the mob of one great city. It has unfortunately for the noble principles which it represented, remained a southern party, and it has now shared the fate of the confederacy, with whose elements it has been in alliance.

There were those who thought Napoleon had a chance after Waterloo, and there will be democrats who will hope for a revival of their party.

Let these consider the situation. The republican party now returns to power with a wisdom born of painful experience. Like the Holly Alliance at Vienna, they will make assurance doubly sure by a radical reconstruction of the political map. The admission of North and South Dakota, Washington, Wyoming, and Idaho—and this will be done at once—will give them ten additional United States senators, and about 25 additional members o the house, making the old game of their enemy—New York and the solid south—an impossibility. They will inaugurate a vigorous foreign policy, that will in all probability result in the annexation of Canada, and the addition of five or six more northern states.

These great movements will fill the popular imagination to the exclusion of economic questions, while any serious demands for fiscal reform can be contented with some slight abatement of taxation. They can thus make it absolutely impossible for a full generation to come, for any party identified with the solid south to attain power. The solid south itself, always politically wise in its generation, seeing no hope through the democracy, will break up. Its old whig elements will come to the front again, and make alliances with the party which can alone give them a share of power." * *

There is a good deal of prophecy in all this, and it will be worth while to see how far wrong the News is in its calculations.

Thanksgiving Day.

Gov. McGill yesterday issued his annual Thanksgiving proclamation as follows:

Pursuant to law and a custom much honored in the observance, I do hereby set apart and appoint Thursday the 29th day of November, instant, "as a day of solemn and public thanksgiving to Almighty God for his blessings to us as a state and nation," and I recommend its observance by religious, family reunions and a general cessation from business.

While there is cause for great thankfulness in the general prosperity prevailing throughout the state, we have nevertheless our unfortunate poor, to whom the appointment of a thanksgiving day, in view of their want and poverty, seems but a hollow mockery. In behalf of these I appeal to the rich and those blessed with abundance, and ask of tham the practice of that Christian precept, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." I sincerely hope that on Thanksgiving day, at least, no Minnesota home will lack the cheer and comfort of plenty. Let the day be signalized by good deed noble and generously done.

"If there be among you a poor man within any of thy gates in thy land, thou shalt not harden thy heart nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother, but thou shalt open thine hand wide to him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him, because for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto."

"Like a beautiful flower, full of color and full of perfume, are the fruitful words of him who acts accordingly.

It is hereby ordered that the capitol shall be closed, and no public business transacted in any of the departments or offices of the state on the day herein designated as Thanksgiving day.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the state to be affixed at the capitol in the city of St. Paul this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight.

A. R. McGILL.

By the governor:
H. MATTSON. Secretary of States.

Out in The Cold.

Warren Sheaf.

That is about the condition of the inhabitants of Northern Minnesota under the present arrangement of the St. P., M. & M. R'y. Since Sunday last the through passenger trains from St. Paul to Winnipeg, have gone via Grand Forks and the West side of the river to Winnipeg, leaving a mixed train on this side. No fault can be found with the arrival and departure of the mails, and we fully realize the fact that all long railroad lines the trains must be at some stations in inconvenient hours, but when the patrons of a road that is doing the amount of business that the road between Crookston and St. Vincent is doing, it shoved off with a cattle train with two dirty, stinking low grade smoking coaches and those left a half mile back from the station while the engine is doing 15 to 20 minutes switching and then when they do run making a time of about 12 to 15 miles an hour, or average time, including stops, of perhaps 10 miles an hour, the citizens receive this part of the arrangement as a gross insult and with great indignation and there is not the least doubt that unless better accommodations are made for the traveling public of Northern Minnesota they will make a grand kick and if the Northern Pacific or some other company should run another road into this section there is no doubt the Manitoba would be left as completely in the cold as we are now.

Result of Third Party Action.

New York Tribune.

The third party prohibitionists in this state must be proud of their work this week. They could not succeed in defeating General Harrison. All that they had the strength to do was to beat Warner Miller and elect in his stead the favorite son of the saloons, and put off for three years the adoption of a high license law, with its inevitable diminution of drunkenness and crime. For a large part of the criminality, profligacy, drunkenness and taxes of this state during the next three years the third party prohibitionists will be directly responsible. This is a proud record for a temperance party.

It will be observed, as the smoke of the conflict clears away, that the efforts of the republican party for the cause of temperance cost it heavily, especially in the three doubtful Eastern states. The professed friends of temperance did not fail, by means of separate tickets, to defeat Mr. Miller in this state and Mr. Phelps in New Jersey, and they served the liquor interest so well in the latter state that a democratic legislature will now have power to repeal local option and license law. In one democratic county, where prohibition was recently voted by a large majority, two liquor-sellers have been elected to the legislature, in part by the votes of the very democrats who voted for prohibition. These voters cared for temperance a little, for democracy a great deal, and for consistency not at all. But the responsibility of dealing with the liquor question will now rest with the democratic party in that state, and to a democratic Governor the votes of the people have given power to veto temperance measures in New York. The republican party has the satisfaction of having made a brave, honest and manly effort, which, it appears, the voters were not sufficiently in favor of temperance to sustain.

A Political Revolution.

Toledo Blade.

The presidential election is a political revolution. Harrison and Morton have carried all the "sure republicans states"—those which cast their votes for James G. Blaine in 1884—and have, besides carried New York, Indiana and West Virginia.

The republicans win, and would have won even had New York cast her electoral vote for Cleveland. The "sure republican states," plus Indiana and West Virginia, cast 203 electoral votes, which gives a majority of 2 over the 201 required to elect, New York's 36 electoral votes swell the republican total to 239.

New York was not the pivotal state of the campaign, after all. Harrison does not depend for his triumph upon a fluke, as did Cleveland in 1884. New York is a big state, and the republicans did noble work, but her position as a political pivot in presidential years is gone by. The star of empire moves westward, and with the growing commonwealths of the northwest admitted as states, New York loses her primacy.

Harrison and Morton carry every Northern state, except New Jersey and Connecticut. Cleveland did not even get the solid south, for West Virginia stepped over into the republican column. The solid south is broken.

The next house of representatives will have a good working majority. It looks now as though it will stand 173 republicans to 155 democrats. The house will then be republican for the first time since March 4, 1883.

The senate, which is now so nearly a tie, will have its republican majority increased, the latest estimate being 40 republicans and 36 democrats.

With both branches of congress and a republican president, the reactionary schemes of the free trade democracy will be utterly ineffectual, and the wheels of national progress and development can not be blocked. The fifty-first congress will have much important work to do.

It will revise the tariff on protective lines and get rid of the surplus.

It will admit north and south Dakota, Washington, Idaho and probably Montana, to the sisterhood of states, thus doing justice to those territories, the leading ones of which should have been admitted two or three years ago, but were kept out for partisian purposes by a democratic house.

It will have control of the census of of 1890, and will decide upon the basis of representation to be in force for the next decade.

It will settle the southern question—and settle it permanently, we hope, so that men will not hold seats in congress to represent voters who do not dare go to the ballot box.

It is a political revolution. The gloomy forebodings of thousands of republicans who feared that the democrats would so strongly intrench themselves in power that they could not be dislodged, are shown to be without adequate foundation. That party has the faculty, whenever intrusted with power, of committing some blunder that disgusts the people and overthrows its supremacy. The free trade policy was the blunder this year.

There is some delightful literature about the Indians in the November Wide Awake. The appeal to the children to build the dining room of the Ramona Industrial School at Santa Fe is repeated, and a list of those who have contributed the last month is published—about one-twentieth of the needed sum is already raised. Then there is a most touching true story by Margaret Owen Foster, entitled "The Little Captive Chief." The incident happened in Oregon about thirty years ago; it shows how completely the Indian nature may be revolutionized by life among civilized people, and also how readily the civilized nature relapses when thrust back into barbarism and savagery. "An evening at Carlisle," by Miss Sparhawk, a teacher in the Indian school, describes an entertainment given by the Indian girls, and pleads eloquently for the education of all our young Indians. In Mrs. Upton's "Children of the White House," a fine chapter is given concerning 'The Household of John Quincy Adams," full of anecdote and fresh historical matter, and very valuable for its twenty-seven illustrations—many of them portraits wholly new to the public; the frontispiece is a bewitching full-length portrait of "The Dorothy Q. of To-Day," a great-great-great-granddaughter of President John Adams, and a relative and namesake of Dr. Holmes' "Dorothy Q." Another beautiful article is entitled "Some Children of Modern Painters," and gives reproductions of many exquisite childhood pictures by half a dozen eminent English and French painters. "The Wild Horseman, Count Chandor," is an account by Madame Radford de Meissner of the famous daring Hungarian Count and his horses, with interesting reproductions of some of the paintings of his exploits which hang in the Chandor Castle at Buda-Pesth. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop has a charming story called "A New Birthday." "Caught in a Snowstorm," by C. S. Messinger, will interest everybody—it is an exciting adventure of two children who went to see "The Mikado." The two serials, "Plucky Smalls" and "Double Roses" are concluded, to make way for a new "Peppers" serial by Margaret Sidney, and one of New England life by J. T. Trowbridge. Harran H. Ballard has a very instructive article on "Ye Knightly Game of Chess." There are many other good things; "Concerning Cats," by Miss Winslow, "Inside an Outline," "The [illegible] of Paul and Virginia," "Young Women," "Irish Crickets." "Who [illegible] the Blacksmith's Apron?" "Moon Pets," "The Little Rebel's Song," "Prize Questions," etc., etc. Wide Awake is $2.40 a year 30 cents a number. Sample back number 5 cents, or of the four Lothrop magazines for 15 cents. D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

CROOKSTON, MINN., NOVEMBER 22.

Departure of the Mugwump.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette.

'The mugwump as a political factor must now disappear. The echo of his voice may yet be heard, but his influence will be nought, and his existence will scarcely be known. He has filled a conspicuous place in the political arena for four years. In '84 the mugwumps elected Cleveland, through the aid of various favoring causes, but their numbers were never in proportion to the noise they made. The next year, flushed with their accidental victory, the undertook to defeat Hill for Governor of New York, by supporting Davenport. The result was that Hill was successful. Then they engaged in various local contests, and in every attempt were beaten. This year they sailed in to elect Cleveland again, not doubting that they could do it with greater ease than they did it when Burchard co-operated with them. The result is that Cleveland is the worst beaten President since Van Buren was crushed by William Henry Harrison in 1840. While electing Cleveland, they would also defeat Hill, so they made a great assault upon him. Result—Hill elected by a greater plurality than that which the state gives to Harrison. In Massachusetts, they would crush Gov. Ames by supporting the young democratic reformer from Cambridge. Result—Ames elected by a majority larger than that given to Blaine. They rushed in to defeat that old soldier and long-time republican, Gen. Banks, by supporting one of their own number, Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Surely, a candidate with such a high-sounding name could but be successful. Result—Banks elected. Hereafter, the mugwump will be only an historic character. He will take his place in the democratic ranks, on a back seat, where he will be chiefly used in shouting, while the orator proceeds, "louder! louder!"

The Republican Party Will Give the Country Good, Honest Work.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette.

The readers of the Gazette will bear witness that this paper has steadily maintained that Gen. Harrison would be elected. We have never doubted his success. We have based our belief that he would be chosen upon the general issues of the campaign; also upon his eminent fitness for the office, upon the unity of his party in his support, and upon the well known fact that the democracy rarely has remained in power anywhere outside of the South more than one term. They have usually come into power as the result of temporary causes, and one term of their political manipulations has been enough to effect their removal at the first opportunity. The incapacity of the party to govern the people on broad and statesmanlike principles has been demonstrated over and over again, and in no case has it been exhibited more conspicuously than in its brief national administration. Its keeping the territory of Dakota, with its population of more than 600,000, from the privilege of statehood, for no other reason than that its people were republicans, is a fair sample of the plan upon which it has acted. Every question that came before congress was brought to this one touchstone—how will it affect the democratic party in its efforts to retain possession of the national government?

Now that the republican party is to resume control of national affairs, these abuses of power will be removed, and questions will be decided upon their merits. There will be no more admissions of contestants to seats in congress simply because they are democrats. If a man is fairly elected, he will be given his seat, but he will not get it simply because his vote is needed to carry doubtful partisan measures. Under republican rule, the country may look for a great amount of much needed legislation, which a democratic house has refused or neglected to give it.

Mr. Cleveland as a Prophet.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette.

The Boston Post of April 28th, 1885, contained the following paragraph:

"Mr. Cleveland remarked the other day to an Indianian: 'Young man, you will never see the end of democratic administrations in this country. The democracy are here to stay.' The President wishes to give the idea that the administration of the government will so thoroughly command the admiration and respect of the people that they will never want the republican party in power again."

This was three and one half years ago when Mr. Cleveland was just enjoying the first delights and dignity of his office. He knows better now. He was extremely sanguine. At that early day he was so convinced of the superexcellence of the administration he was about to give the country that he felt sure that nothing less than administrations of the same pattern would content the nation.

Then and Now.

Duluth Trebune.

Democrats who lost so much good hard cash on Cleveland are now cursing some of the leading democratic papers for the extravagant claims made by them prior to the election, and which were so misleding as to cause men to give large odds to republicans who were willing to bet on Harrison,

Betting of every kind is not only a bad and immoral practice but it is also unlawful in most of the states; and while election bets are just as much a violation of these statutes as betting on cards, yet the feeling is very prevalent that it is far less wicked than any other kind of betting.

Those who lost their money on the result of the late election, however, have good cause of complaint against those newspapers which deceived them as to the real situation, as appears by the following in the Chicago Herald of Sept. 21:

"A republican poll of the voters of Indianapolis shows a democratic majority of 1,150. Indianapolis knows Mr. Harrison and the rest of the country is finding him out."

The above appeared in the editorial columns of the Herald on the date named and purported to be a mere statement of fact. How far it was from the truth, apears by the following in the Philadelphia Times of November 9, a paper which supported Mr, Cleveland:

Official returns from all the precints show that General Harrison carried the city of Indianapolis by a plurality of 156, the vote being Harrison, 13.326; Cleveland, 13,170."

The trouble with those who had lost their money on Mr. Cleveland was that they were so strongly partisan that they depended wholly upon the statement of partisan newspapers on their own side of the house.

The result was they wagered their money not on their judgment but their party bias.

Grover Cleveland's Defeat.

The Irish World.

The battle is ended, and the free traders have been routed at every point. As we write the air is rent with the glad cheers of the great army of protectionists, whose magnificent victory has saved the country from the greatest danger that has confronted it since audacious rebellion fired upon the nation's flag at Sumter. The red bandana has gone down in defeat and there will be mourning over it in England. The conspirators against American industries who had taken it as their standard have been flaunting it in our faces for the last four months. Thus challenged the Protectionist looked to the Stars and Stripes for inspiration and accepted the gauge of battle that had been flung down by the free traders.

The Irish world recognizing that it was to be a fight to the death threw itself on the side of protection. We believed that the defeat of Cleveland would so disorganize the free traders that they would not be heard from again in our day and generation. There was, therefore, nothing left for us to do but fight as best we could in defence of the American policy of protection.

We knew that if the issue could be placed before the American people fairly and squarely there could be no doubt as to what their verdict would be. We desired that when that verdict was rendered Irish-Americans could say that they had played no inconsiderable part in the work to stamping out the free-trade conspiracy that had been hatched by Cleveland and his friends. In this hour of triumphant victory we rejoice to be able to say that our appeals to Irish-Americans to stand by protection and the stars and stripes as against free trade and the scarlet symbol of English free trade have been answered right nobly.

The bro-British faction, which is composed of free trade mugwumps, confidently expected that the party of free trade, strengthened by their accession, would carry the day. It was taken for granted that the Irish-American element of the party would walk up to the polls and vote for the pro-British policy that Grover Cleveland had forced upon the democracy. If the free traders had not been mistaken in this calculation it is doubtful if the country to-day would be rejoicing over the election of General Harrison.

Whilst offering our congratulations to our readers on the result of the first pitch battle between protection and free trade we must remind them that the defeat to the pro-British candidate will not put an end to English intrigues againts this republic. England in trying to capture the American market is playing for a rich prize. The failure of the free traders to elect Cleveland has disarranged her plans, but has not made her lay them aside altogether. She still expect to carry to a successful issue the free trade conspirey. Let us hope that when she is again found plotting against republic Irish-American will be again as loyal to America as they proved themselves to be when they voted last Tuesday against Grover Cleveland and English free trade.

Boston Herald; Mrs. Thurman is reported to be overjoyed at the result of the election. She dislikes the frippery of official life in Washington, and rejoices that she will not be obliged to exchange her peaceful home in Columbus for the bustle and tumult of the capital of the nation. It is safe to say that the Old Roman is heartily in accord with his wife on this subject. In his serene old age he has the esteem and respect of his countrymen, whether he is in high official station or out of it.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette: This is all right for the Old Roman and his wife, but how do Grover and his wife like it?

Moorhead News.

It is reported from St. Paul that Gov. McGill is looming up a candidate for United States senator, and that the friends of Gov. Pillsbury and Loren Fletcher will unite upon the governor. It is also alleged that Governor-elect Merriam is giving Mr. Sabin's candidacy all the help he can in payment of Mr. Sabin's good offices to Merriam in helping him to get the nomination for governor. These rumors should be taken with many grains of allowance. Gov. McGill will no doubt have a good many friends in the legislature, but it is not probable that the vote for him will be any more than a complimentary one. Again we do not imagine or believe that Mr. Merriam is taking an active part in the canvass for United States senator, either in the interest of Senator Sabin or any other candidate. Hon. W. D. Washburn will in all probability develop so much strength outside of Hennepin county that the apparent discord at present existing in the delegation of that county will be harmonized and they will unite solidly upon Mr. Washburn. Uncle Loren Fletcher is too loyal to his city, too loyal a republican and too schrewd a politician to antagonize a man who has done so much for the material prosperity of Minneapolis as well as for the state at large as has Gen. Washburn, especially when he sees him coming in strong from the country districts, and is likely to get there anyhow. There will be a list of candidates for senator of considerable length on the first one or two ballots, but the fight is going to be between Senator Sabin and Gen. Washburn, with the chances greatly in favor of the latter. The people of Minnesota admire the straightout quality in their leaders. They admire a man who makes no compromises with the opposition, and who will not share the political rewards which come from a combination of disaffected republicans with democrats. Such a man is Gen. Washburn. He is true blue, always staunch, consistent and reliable, never wavering. As much cannot be said of Senator Sabin, however able and worthy he may be in other respects. It has not been forgotten that Mr. Sabin was the ostensible friend of Senator Windom in the winter of 1883, and the suspicion of treachery which Mr. Sabin's success engendered at that time has not been fully dissipated. However that may be the people have since realized that when Sabin went up and Windom went down the State of Minnesota lost prestige in the national councils. The legislature to meet next January is so strongly republican that there is no necessity for compromising with any party or faction. Let there be a caucus of republicans; let them unite on the candidate and support him loyally. If this is done a true and unflinching republican will be elected, and if the mantle fall upon the shoulders of Gen. Washburn, as we trust it may, there will be no doubt that it will be worthily bestowed.

Instead of preparing vetoes of bills granting pensions of six to eight dollars a months to soldiers' widows, Cleveland will have time to devote to more profitable reform work. He will have plenty of time to go fishing.

Duluth Herald: In referring to the necessity for a new legislative apportionment of the state, the Minneapolis Journal recognizes the injustice which is done Duluth and the forty-sixth district, and says: "The forty-sixth or Duluth district is placed at the greatest disadvantage. It includes the counties of Hubbard, Carlton, St. Louis, Wadena, Cook, Lake, Itasca, Cass and Aitkin. The total vote in 1886 was 7,472, and the delegation in the legislature consists of only one senator and one representative, an average of 3,734 votes to a member. The vote for 1888, although not official, makes a still worse showing than that of 1886, but the figures of 1886 are sufficient to show that the legislature of 1887 had no right to shirk the duty of readjustment of the representation to correspond with the change in population. It is only a question of justice, and a matter which ought to be taken up among the first things to be considered when the legislature meets." Should a reapportionment be made at the next session, which now seems probable, Duluth will receive increased representation, but not as much as she is entitled to, as the basis of representation will be made upon the population shown by the census of 1885. As Duluth and St. Louis County have at least doubled in population since then we will get just one half the representation tuo which or population would now entitle us, and as the new apportionment will not go into effect for two years, even if it is authorized by the legislature at once, it will be seen that we will really not have more than one-third as much representation as we should. But then as one-third of a loaf is better than none, Duluth is decidedly in favor of a reapportionment now and will be in favor of another one as soon as possible after the census of 1890 is taken.

Hubbard's second term was made three years in order to bring the election of governor into the even years.

A. R. McGill's plurality in 1886 was 2,600.

W. R. Merriam's plurality this fall is over 25,000. He is elected by a larger majority than any other governor, with the single exception of Gov. Hubbard.

Col. Graves' Friends.

Fergus Falls Journal: No man has been mentioned for speaker who represents so many qualifications for the office as Col. C. H. Graves, of Duluth, and we hope to see him preside over the next house. His chief opponent seems to be D. F. Morgan, of Albert Lea. South Minnesota, which has five times as many representatives, will probably unite on him and thus continue their grip upon the affairs of the state. It is a fact worth noticing that Col. Graves is the sole representative of 75,000 people, while Mr. Morgan and his colleague represent less than 15,000. Such are the inequalities of our apportionment. Northern Minnesota should back Col. Graves and see if this injustice cannot be remedied.

Fergus Falls Journal: Col. Graves, of Duluth, in a note to the Journal, says that the report which has been published in the St. Paul papers to the effect that he was opposed to Gen. Washburn is incorrect. On the contrary, he says he is not pledged to any senatorial candidate, and if elected speaker he will be elected entirely independent of the senatorial contest. Col. Graves very wisely says that the legislation of the state should not be influenced in the least by this contest, and if he is elected speaker, it will not be. This sentiment of Col. Graves should commend him to the people of the state as the proper man for the position to which he aspires. Too often in the past the legislation, not only of this state, but of others, has been made a secondary matter to the election of a United States senator, and many men and measures have been ignored because they did not have the right bearing upon the senatorial contest. It is to be hoped that this year the senatorship will be settled early, so that the members can take up the legislative work before them unannoyed by senatorial strife.

The Electoral "College."

Toledo Blade.

The presidential election, so-called, is over but there is no president yet elected. All the people have done is to choose, by states, the men who are to elect the president. The voters in each state have chosen as many of these electors as that state has representatives and senators in congress. The day of the real presidential election is yet to come; that is, the day on which the electors chosen in each state will meet in the state's capital to formally ballot for president and vice president of the United States. The day on which this will be done is the first Wednesday in December, which this year will be December 5th.

These electors who have been chosen have the right to vote, in each state, for whomever they shall desire for president or vice president—the only constitutional limitation being that only one of these shall be a citizen of the state whose electors are voting; that is, the president and vice president may not both be citizens of the same state. This provision was intended to guard against the imagined danger of the larger states attempting to usurp authority, or obtain an undue influence in the national government.

But, although the electors are legally free to vote for whom they please, they are in honor bound to vote for the candidate of the party which elected them. In the earlier days of the republic, party nominations were not made; but as as soon as the people divided into two great hostile political camps, the plan of making party nominations for the two highest offices was adopted, and from that time to this no elector has ever violated the implied pledge which he makes, in accepting the nomination for elector, to vote for his party's candidates.

The electors of the whole union never meet as an organized body. The entire machinery of the electors is a device to have the president elected by the states, and not by the people. The whole body is called, for convenience, the "electorial college," though the name is unknown to the law, and is but a popular designation, bestowed for convenience. The electors from each state meet and cast their votes for the candidates of their party. When this is done, the electors must sign three certificates of all the votes given by them. One of these is forwarded by messenger to the president of the United States senate before the first Wednesday of the following January. Another is sent by mail, and the third is delivered to the judge of the district in which the electors have assembled. On the second Wednesday in the following February, congress meets and canvasses the electorial votes and makes official declaration of a president and vice president for the next four years.

The electorial vote on December 5th next will be cast as follows:

FOR HARRISON.		FOR CLEVELAND.
California..................	8	Alabama..................	10
Colorado....................	3	Arkansas..................	7
Illinois........................	22	Connecticut..............	6
Indiana.......................	15	Delaware..................	3
Iowa...........................	13	Florida......................	4
Kansas........................	8	Georgia.....................	12
Maine.........................	6	Kentucky..................	13
Massachusetts............	14	Louisiana..................	8
Michigan....................	13	Maryland..................	8
Minnesota..................	7	Mississippi...............	9
Nebraska....................	5	Missouri....................	19
Nevada.......................	3	New Jersey..............	9
New Hampshire.........	3	North Carolina.........	11
New York..................	36	South Carolina.........	9
Ohio...........................	23	Tennessee................	12
Oregon.......................	3	Texas.......................	13
Pennsylvania.............	30	Virginia...................	12
Rhode Island..............	4	West Virginia..........	6
Vermont.....................	4	Total......................	168
Wisconsin..................	11
Total..........................	233

The total number of electorial votes is 401, of which it requires a majority to elect—and 201, being a majority, is the lowest required number. Hence Harrison will have 68 more votes than are needed, while Cleveland will lack 33 votes.

Prospective States.

Minneapolis Journal: It is probable that when the northwestern territories are admitted as states an effort will be made to bring in Utah and New Mexico. Utah ought never to be admitted until the Mormon hierarchy has been fully overthrown and is no longer able to control the vote of the territory. As for New Mexico, it has population enough, but it has the poorest class of inhabitants to be found in any part of the country—the poorest material out of which to make citizens. It is necessary in New Mexico to conduct the business of the territorial legislature in Spanish as well as in English, and the laws of the territory are printed in both languages, because there is such a large element of the population that cannot read or speak English. A very large numbes cannot read anything. The illiteracy of the territory (number of those unable to read) was given by the census of 1880 at 60.2 per cent. The native poor are but a short remove from the peons of Mexico. They are attached to heads of old falihes as dependents. They have in a great many cases no individual or divided interest in the land they occupy but a sort of trible interest. Any exercise of the elective franchise by them is apt to be taken entirely under the influence and control of the heads of these clans and to produce anything but the legitimate fruits of citizenship. To place such a population on a par with Dakota, where the percentage of those who could not read was only 3.1 in 1880 is indefensible even on political grounds.

Duluth Herald: The friends and admirers of Clinton B. Fisk, the prohibition candidate for president, think that he should have some distinctive office and arrangements have accordingly been made to secure the position of president of Dickinson college. It is understood, however, that his ambition does not run in that direction and that he will decline the proffered honor. Had Cleveland been elected Fisk might have looked forward to a cabinet position.

Farm, Stock and Home: "My father planted that wind-break," said a young farmer we were visiting recently, as he pointed towards a triple row of magnificent willows, twenty-five or thirty feet high, which dordered three sides of the ten acres of the farm devoted to house, barns, sheds, garden, orchard, etc. Sheltered by the willows, ash, maple, black walnut and other hard and valuable timber was growing. Fruit trees and vines were strong and healthy, and had borne bountifully in their season; around the whole place was an air of comfort and thrift never found around a treeless, shadeless, wind-swept habitation. "My father planted that wind-break." The voice was tremulous with gratitude and love, and there was just a promise of a tear in the eye, but a tender hallowed voice and tear, and it was plain to be seen that when the thoughtful, provident father planted the wind-break around the home of his children he also planted in their hearts monuments of affection and grateful remembrance which will ever abide with them. It is within the power of nearly every farmer to insure his children the inheritance of a wind-break; we wonder more of them do not do it.

Victory is Ours.

Warren Register.

We have all heard of the Irishman who got his pig to Dublin by pretending he was going to Cork. A similar dodge was tried by the democrats in the late campaign, by poseing before the voters as "the party of the people." But it failed to work as successfully for them as did the "civil service reform" dodge of four years ago. This time, their protestations of honesty and good intentions, and their claims for services rendered the country during the present administrations, failed to materialize in votes, as they hoped for. The majority concluded the democrats had done enough for the country and earned a rest; and this restoration of the Grand Old Party to power, is a vindication of its policy and achievements in the past, and an evidence of the confidence reposed in its professions for the future. It is also an evidence of the hold upon the minds and consciences of the people acquired through the teachings and acts of the republican party for a quarter of a century,—and it is a glorious party! Every republican—aye, every American citizen—has reason to be proud of its achievements.

It preserved the Union, when assailed by the mailed hand of gigantic rebellion; abolished slavery; gave us the best currency and the best financial system in the world; maintained the public credit at home and abroad; refunded the public debt at a low rate of interest; secured the rights of our foreign-born citizens; built up and protected American industries; resumed specie payment; gave us the homestead law and the Pacific railroads; initiated civil service reform, and gave to the world the grand principle of international arbitration; made all men in this nation free and equal before the law, and has always insisted on a free ballot and a fair count. It has carried the most stupendous civil war of modern times to a successful issue, and secured and crystalized the fruits of victory in wise, humane, and beneficent provision incorporated into the constitution, for the equal benefit of both the victors and the vanquished.

It has established, in the organic laws of the land, as facts, great principles of right and justice, that before existed only in theory deduced from glittering generalities. It has done more for the advancement of right and the good of humanity, than any other political agency since the world began; and so long as men believe in a republican form of government, and so long as men love liberty, freedom, right and justice—so long, will they love and honor the principles and achievements of the Grand Old Party, which deserve to be inscribed in letters of gold high up in the world's temple of fame, and across the face of the Heavens in words of living light, as indelibly as they are written in the hearts of the people.

Long live the republic! And long live its defender and preserver, the republican party.

The Prohibitory Vote.

Northampton (Mass.) Gazette.

The prohibitory vote increased in New York over the vote of St. John in '84, but it falls largely short of the vote of two years ago. In some counties it is less than the '84 vote, but generally the returns show a slight increase. In Connecticut there was an increase from 2305 in '84 to 4105 in '88. In Massachusetts there is a falling off of 1282 from '84. In New Hampshire and Vermont there is a falling off. The probability is that Fisk's vote will exceed St. John's. It was, at least, large enough to give Connecticut to the democrats and to elect that great apostle of temperance and reform, Gov. Hill of New York. A few more victories of this sort will crown the third party with a fine wreath of political glory.

Dr. Blackmer of Springfield is confident that the full returns will show that the prohibiton vote will reach 300,000, which would be double what it was in '84. The Doctor is evidently too sanguine. Fisk's vote is likely to considerably exceed St. John's. It increased in the close states, where great efforts were made, but in states where it could make no difference with the result, the gains do not yet appear.

The Warren Register is disposed to be sarcastic about "Crookston's Jubilation" and makes the assertion that, "no reception committee, no band was on hand to welcome the guests." Bro. "If Crookston will only keep her bonnet on, and vote the $50.000 bonds to the Manitoba road, she will hear of something to her advantage—she will get something real nice, Manitoba car-shops—mebbe!" This was the "promise" (?) held out to this city not long ago, and the advocates of the bonds said further: "Mr. Hill would like a distinctively Manitoba town, one town friendly to him, for which he could do great things and he is anxious to have that city Crookston!" Well, the bonds were voted and what has Crookston got? She has got sidetracked, and the other side of the river gets all of the consideration the company can show any country. Grand Forks gave the N. P. road a bonus to build in, and we heard of great things Mr. Hill was going to do to bust Grand Forks. Crookston voted Mr. Hill's road a bonus of $50,000 and gets—left. Mr. Hill gives Grand Forks far better facilities than he does "his own" city—the city that with simple, loving trust, and guileless, child-like simplicity, (which is pathetic in its innocence) and why does he do it? Not because he desires to reward G. F. for giving bonds to a rival road but simply and solely because it is BUSINESS to do it. He is obliged to do so to compete with the N. P. road. The moral of all this is perfectly plain and points to the old saying: "Providence helps those who help themselves," and shows us that we should at the first opportunity put ourselves in shape to aid any road that may seek an entrance to this city. We have fully tasted the sweets of being "a Manitoba city" or, a one-railroad town and we see where we get left. We have no one to blame but ourselves for business is business and it is business for everyone to look out for his own interests. If this city ever amounts to anything great it is high time to be doing something to make her so. The first step in that direction is to get the opportunity to aid any road that would be of practical benefit to us. This privilege can be obtained at the next session of the legislature.

Anent the subject of the closing of saloons in accordance with the law we do not see why this should be so difficult as many seem to suppose. A simple way would be to require the curtains rolled up and all obstructions removed at 11 o'clock at night and during the day Sunday. On Sunday last one saloon adopted this plan which shows that the proprietors of it honestly intend to keep the law.

L. Grey returned from Butte last week. Says he likes that climate very well, what he saw of it but for farming this country will beat that all hollow. While capital can find lucrative employment, and miners can find work, the man who desires to farm has no business there. He has been offered a good situation there and may decide to accept it.

Harry Attix thinks it is a mighty mean man who will steal wheat from a farmer in this country, but the animal that will steal the seed wheat from a man who has just lost his house and all therein contained takes the whole bakery for meanness and is just too mean to be allowed to live. Last week he received word that his granary had been broken into and his seed wheat all stolen. He at once went out to Mentor and found that his granary had indeed been broken open and considerable wheat stolen but not quite all. He estimates a loss of 60 bushels of No. 1 Hard and is quietly wishing he could catch onto the thief. If he should we'll bet that chap will wish he had never tried to raise No. 1 Hard wheat in this country in that way as Harry is justly hostile. It is pretty tough after Harry's recent fiery experience to have the wheat whereon he depended for next crop stolen and words fail to describe the guilty wretch that did it.

Accidental Shooting.

On Monday last Camel Bruyette and a companion went hunting rabbits, About six o'clock they returned to Mr. B's residence. Mr. B. went in first, followed by his friend, who carried his shot-gun in muzzle first. In some way the hammer struck the door-casing, discharging a load of buckshot into Mr. B's left leg. The unfortunate man was brought from his residence on Black River to this city for medical attendance, and is now doing as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

COUNTY NEWS.

St. Hilaire Spectator.

Rev. J. J. Edwards, of the Crookston M. E. church, is holding a series of revival meetings here this week.

A large number of the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Patterson surprised them last Thursday evening at their home, it being the fifth anniversary of their wedding. A number of presents were made, among which were a pair of wooden shoes for each. Dancing was engaged in, and everyone seemed to thoroughly enjoy themselves.

On Sunday the 18th inst., the large store building owned by M. Holmes on the corner of Third and Broadway stsreets and occupied by Holmes Bros., as a hardware store had a narrow escape from being consumed by fire. Albert Iten ran his traction engine past the store and sparks from the smoke stack set fire to the saw dust at the rear end of the building. Luckily the fire was discovered in time and was soon extinguished. No damage was done.

The Thirteen Towns.

We don't know whether it was on account of their superior skill or owing to their luck, but certain it is, that two of Fosston's sports, who, when out this week with two Crookston and two Detroit sports, returned with five big deer, while the Crookston and Detroit boys returned with bushels of experience but no deer.

Messrs. Morrissey and Mitchell, two of Crookston's well known hunters, have been doing deadly slaughter among the timid deer in Fosston and vicinity during the past week.

Ben Clements, of Crookston, was registered at the Belmont Friday night. He was much surprised at the size of the town here, and said that he did not expect to see anywhere as near as large a town.

What's the Matter With Washburn.

Just now the all-absorbing topic in political circles is "who shall succeed Senator Sabin?" It should be answered by the selection of the very best timber we have. Knute Nelson has lots of warm admirers in the state and he could have the position if he would take it, and while we regret it we are fully convinced that Mr. Nelson will accept no office whatever. He writes us: "After March 4th I shall be plain, Knute Nelson, Attorney-at-law. This district has used me well; I am fully satisfied and am proud that I can turn over a politically united district to so good a man with so good a majority." Among the names proposed, (and all are good ones) is the name of a man who has done as much, if not more than any man in it for the upbuilding of our state—who has once faithfully represented her in the halls of congress—whose name is a tower of strength, well-known all over our broad union, a man who knows the needs of this great commonwealth and also knows how to provide for them. That man, that broad and influential statesman is of Minneapolis. With him in the senate Minnesota will have two of the strongest and best men in that body, men of whom she is and justly may be proud. The only objection we have seen urged yet is that Mr. W. lives in Minneapolis, an objection too utterly pitiable to be put forth by any sensible man. What the state NEEDS to-day is her best timber, and she can boast of no better than the Hon. C. K. Davis and the Hon. W. D. Washburn.

The St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Co. will run a series of cheap holiday excursions from points on their line in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba north of, and including, Grand Forks, Crookston, St. Johns, Devils Lake, Grafton, St. Vincent, Winnipeg, etc., etc., for which the very low rate of $40,00 for the round trip will apply to points in Eastern and Western Ontario and Quebec. Tickets will be issued Nov. 5th, 12th, 20th, 27th, and Dec. 3d, 11th, and 17th, limited to 90 days from date of sale and good for stop-over privileges.

A comparison of distances will show that the Manitoba is the shortest line by a great many miles between St. Paul and Minneapolis or Ontario and the principal points in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba from which these excursion rates apply.

For these special excursions the Manitoba will run dining cars, Palace Sleepers, free colonist cars and elegant day coaches. This is the only road to Manitoba, Minnesota and Dakota owning and controlling its own dining and sleeping cars, and furnishes a service which is not equalled by any line in the west.

The Lucas Lien Law.

The Minneapolis Journal.

The act of the supreme court in declaring the Lucas lien law unconstitutional suggests the wisdom of entrusting the business of law making to people who know something about what the law is. Every once in awhile there arises a prejudice against lawyers in legislative bodies, and other people whose occupation and training have afforded them no opportunity to familiarize themselves with the law, and who may have no inclination to make it a study, are intrusted with the duty of preparing new laws and changing old ones. They tackle the most complicated questions with the utmost confidence and fearlessness. They have a panacea for an ill and they immediately go about applying it without knowing what may be the effect of their treatment. They are often, as happened in this case, successful only in doing more harm than good.

The supreme court leaves absolutely nothing of the Lucas lien law. It was undoubtedly drawn and passed with the best of intentions; no one questions that, but that does not save a single shred of it when it comes to be tested by the measure of its constitutionality. It is declared to be unconstitutional in that it gives a lien on a homestead in the absence of an agreement between the owner of the homestead and the party holding the lien. It is held to be repugnant to that provision of the constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt. The effort to make a contractor, no matter how honestly he may have paid over every dollar received for a contract to the material man and the laborer, liable to criminal prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, when his only fault may have been that he took the contract too cheap, the supreme court emphatically declares cannot be sustained for a minute. A peculiar provision of the laws is that the mere fact that the person furnishing material or labor was not enjoined by the owner of the property shall be conclusive evidence that it was with the consent of the owner that the material or labor was furnished. This, as the supreme court suggests, opens the way for a trespasser to deprive an owner of his property without his consent or without his knowledge. That the supreme court should interfere to prevent such an act is right, but it also suggests that the application of substantially the same principle in the famous tax title cases two years ago would have been productive of equally good results in maintaining the confidence of the people in the just protection of the law.

But a more objectionable feature, in the view of the court, than any yet named is the provision of the law that a lien established under it shall take precedence of any other title—a mortgage, for instance that may have been executed before the material was contracted for or the labor hired. Another door is opened here for the entrance of fraud, unintentionally of course, but nevertheless opened. It is easy to conceive how a dishonest owner of a lot might obtain a loan on his ground with which to elect a building, and then conspire with some other dishonest man to defraud the mortgagee of his money, if a lien were allowed to take precedence of the mortgage.

The district courts of the state have generally held against the constitutionality of this law, except in Hennepin County, where, unfortunately, the record of the courts in the other way. The result of this fiasco has been a waste of time on the part of the legislature, much needless litigation, a creation of uncertainty in titles affected by it, a feeling of distrust on the part of eastern capital from which it may take some time to recover, and so far as the interest of labor are concerned, no benefit whatever, but a necessity, if anything further is to be done, of beginning all over again, and of proceeding in accordance with well established principles of law and justice. The only possible benefit, dearly bought, is that such a notable illustration of the effects of hasty and ill-considered legislation, coming on the eve of another session, may not be lost upon the next legislature.

Obituary.

East Grand Forks Courier.

On Monday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, Mrs. Lottie Madson, aged 34 years, 7 months and 22 days.

The late Mrs. Madson was the wife of City Treasurer C. Madson, and came to this city with her husband from Minneapolis during the summer of 1882. For the past three years Mrs. Madson has been confined to her bed. During all these weary months her husband never ceased to lavish the kindest attentions on his suffering wife. At times she would rally, when her physician would become hopeful; but her system weakened by long illness, was not able to cope with the disease, and on Monday she passed away, the direct cause of her death being inflamation of the bowels. Mrs. Madson was born in Sweden, and came to America in 1870, settling in Minneapolis, where she was married April 17th, 1888. Of a genial, bright and vivacious disposition, hers was a happy home until disease entered. In her death two small children—boys—are bereft of a mother's care. The only family relatives Mrs. Madson had in this country was a sister, now residing in Duluth. The funeral occurred on Wednesday afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Mendenhall officiating. The remains were followed to their last resting place by a large concourse of friends, who deeply sympathize with the husband in his loss.

HER LIFE.

She lived and labored midst the lowest things,
Walked at my side and talked, and oft did fill
The gracious hours that friendly twilight brings
With toil, naught questioning if good or ill
Were hers; soft lullabies she crooned at eve,
Like poppies' breath falling down tenderly
On infant eyelids that gay sports would leave
To nestle close and sleep upon her knee,
Her life has colorless and commonplace,
Devoid of poetry—I thought it so,
For I was blind, and could not see the grace
That grew through common duties, now know,
Since she is gone from me and all her cares,
Intertained an angel unawares.

The Wanderer's Return.

A Thanksgiving Story.

Every Christmas, or New Year's, or Thanksgiving day, Mrs. Forrest placed a chair at the table for their only son and child, David. who had left his home fifteen years before, at the age of nineteen. Since he left, no word from him had reached them. The faithful heart of the mother refused to think of the lad as dead, and so she laid his plate at his old place, and by it placed a little bouquet of his favorite flowers.

"You see, he may come back at any time, father, and he'd understand that we've been thinking of him all the time.

The old man shook his head. "Boys like David don't come back, Sarah. Vice drove him away, and vice will probably keep him away. If its any gratification for you to keep a place at the table for him, you know that I don't object; but I wish you could make up your mind that he will never come back. These yearly reminders only bring the old pain back, and if I could, I should like to forget him altogether."

"No, you wouldn't James. He was wild and disobedient, and brought shame and sorrow over this threshold; but for all that, he's our only child, and I'm sure we can neither of us forget that."

It was just fifteen years since the young man came home one night in a beastly state of intoxication. It was not the first time, but it was the first time his father had seen him in that condition. He was a clerk in a dry good store, and when he came home late at night, his father supposed he had been detained by his business, and went contentedly to bed. The poor wife, who sat up for the wayward boy, knew better; but like many a gentle but unwise mother, she concealed her son's vice from his father, hoping he might reform. Her husband was a very stern man, and was unsparing in his denunciations of the special vice of intemperance. The truth is, she was actually afraid to tell him.

The night I have spoken of, Mr. Forrest had a letter to write, which kept him in the sitting room long after his usual bedtime. When the slobbering, idiotic young drunkard reeled into the room, his father sprung from his chair as if he had been shot. He looked at his son, but did not say a word. Then he sat deliberately down in a chair and watched him, with such a look on his white, set face that his terrified wife laid her trembling hand on his arm. He shook it off. In a few moments he turned to her, and said, in a hard, merciless voice:

"How long has this been going on, Sarah?"

"Oh, I don't know, James!" she sobbed. "I've seen him two or three times under the influence of liquor, but never so bad as this, James. I didn't tell you because he promised to reform. Oh, don't be too hard on him, father! Pray, don't be too hard upon him!"

"Too hard!" he repeated, looking with angry disgust at the young man, who was huddled in a heap in a large arm chair, trying vainly to sit erect, with a silly drunken grin on his face. "Too hard! Why, if I turned him out of the house this very night, and disowned him as my son, I should be doing right! And you have kept this from me? How could you, how dare you, do it, and thus became responsible for this disgrace? I might have checked it. Now it's too late. Look at that idiotic face; the stamp of the drunkard who is past recovery is upon it. It's too late!"

"Oh, don't, don't, James!" his wife cried, kneeling beside him. "I did it for the best. Don't say it's too late! He's but little more than a child yet, and bad company has led him astray."

The drunken boy laughed idiotically.

"Don't try and get him away," Mr. Forest said, sternly. "He shall stay there all night, and I shall sit up with him. You heard what he said!" With a bitter laugh. "Our son is not only a drunkark, but a thief. Let him stay there; I want to get accustomed to the disgrace which has come upon me, and a night with that object before me will help me to realize it. Do you go to bed. I must take his management out of your weak hands."

"You won't drive him away, James? You'll give him a chance? You'll give him one opportunity to try to reform? Don't turn him out into the wicked world, to be lost forever!" she pleaded, with sobs. Her husband did not immediately answer her but at last he said:

"I will not drive him away yet. He shall have one chance more—a single one. I'll make him understand that, when he can understand anything. Now leave me with him."

The poor mother crept weeping to her bed. She left the door partly open between the rooms, that she might watch both husband and son. Mr. Forrest sat rigid and motionless, as if he was carved in stone, but the boy slept on heavily. Towards morning he began to move uneasily in his seat, then raised his head from the table and straightened himself up. The mother, whose eyes had not closed through the whole of that long night, could almost see the terrified expression in his eyes when they fell on his father's grim figure opposite. He rose unsteadily to his feet.

"Stop, sir!" said the father, walking to him. "I have a few words to say to you."

What was said was in too low a voice for Mrs. Forrest to hear. There were a few brief questions, and when David answered one of them, he hung his head like a convicted criminal. Then she heard her husband's stern voice for a few minutes longer, and David half staggered to the back door, opened it and passed out.

Mrs. Forrest did not dare ask her husband any questions, but did not feel uneasy when David did not appear at breakfast. She concluded he had gone to the store, not wishing to meet his father so soon again. But when dinner-time came, and he was still absent, her fears were awakened, and she noticed her husband cast uneasy glances towards the door whenever it was opened. She put on her bonnet after dinner, and went directly to the store. Mr. Rapp was standing at the door.

"Good-evening, Mrs. Forrest!" he said. "Where on earth is David today?"

"Isn't he in the store?" she asked, with her heart beating like a sledge-hammer.

"Indeed, he isn't. He came in for a minute early this morning, and handed me a ten-dollar bill, and mumbled out something about having forgotten to put it in the till. I couldn't make out what he did say. He looked pale and sick, and I,m sure ought to have been in bed."

Without a word Mrs. Forrest hurried home.

"What did you say to him?" she cried, passionately, to her husband.

"You've been harsh and cruel to him, I know, and now he's gone away, and I shall never, never see my boy again!"

"I told him what I said I would," he answered coldly. "One more chance I gave him for amendment. Yes, I told him he was a disgrace, a clinging disgrace, for I didn't believe he would reform. I gave him some money to replace what he stole, and that was all. I don't regret a word I said. Reproach your own weakness. It isn't just to reproach me. Since he has chosen to leave us, it is perhaps the best thing he could do."

But though Mr. Forrest spoke in this manner, he spared neither money nor labor to gain some tidings of his son. They traced him to a seaport town, and then lost all trace as utterly as if the earth had closed over him. As months and years rolled by, Mr. Forrest gave up expectation of ever seeing him again, but the mother hoped still. The father grew more silent and sad. Time as it passed had taught him that he had erred in the harshness and bitterness with which he had treated his son, and he would have liked to retract some of his words. Misfortunes, too, had pressed upon him. His crops had failed three years in succession, he had mortgaged his farm in order that he might live: and in a few years there was to be a foreclosure of the mortgage, and the old place must pass out of his hands.

"It's no use striving any longer, Sarah," he said, drearily; "I do not know where to look for help, we must submit and leave the old homestead. Father was born here, as well as myself, and I hoped to die in the house which he died. We'll barely have a roof over us at Myron Cottage, but at least, it will be our own. We didn't think much of it when your aunt left it to you, and now it is our last refuge."

"It will outlast our time, James," she said, sadly. "There's no one to come after us unless David comes home."

Mr. Forrest shook his head. He had long ceased to combat what he said was his wife's monomania about the return of his son. She always insisted that in the family devotion he should be prayed for as still living, and with a cruel pang the father uttered the name of the boy he believed dead.

"It will be our last Thanksgiving dinner on the old place," he said, the day before Thanksgiving. "A lonely one indeed. I wonder if in all the world there is a couple as lonely and as desolate as we are."

She did not speak, but slipped her hand in his. He pressed it warmly, the faithful hand which had never wearied in its tender care of him, and there the old couple sat, silent and thoughtful. They did not need to speak. Each knew of what the other was thinking. The mother said in her heart, "Dear Lord, bring our boy back to us." The father thought, "Lord, help us to bear patiently the afflictions that are bringing our gray hairs with sorrow to the grave."

Thanksgiving Day dawned. It was a dismal day. The rain poured, the wind blew, the sodden leaves covered the earth, the whole landscape was dreary.

"It's pretty dismal, isn't it, mother? said the old man. It's a good thing we don't expect guests in this storm. Well, I suppose we ought to be thankful for a shelter this weather, and food enough to keep us from starving."

"Is that all we have, father?" asked his patient wife. "We have health and hope——"

"Hope of what?" he asked, smiling sadly. "I think, my dear, you and I shook hands with hope long ago and bid it farewell."

"Hope of a home where all these longings and heartaches will be over. O, James, what can keep that from us?"

"You are right," he said solemnly, and I needed the reproof. "We will make this a kind of sacramental day, and wrestle with our griefs, as Joseph did with the angel, until they bless us. Why, there is a traveler out in all this rain! He looks as if he didn't know which way to go."

"Call him in, James," said his wife. I'm glad the Lord has sent some one to eat our Thanksgiving dinner with us."

The traveler obeyed the call of the old man, and dashed into the yard.

"Stranger, this is a heavy storm; come in and stop until the rain holds up," Mr. Forrest called out. "Put up your horse in the stable there. We have no servants, and I can't venture into the rain to help you."

In a few minutes the traveler stood at the threshold. A tall, well-built man, with a heavy brown beard and moustache which nearly covered his face.

"Come in, come in," Mr. Forrest said. "Why, you are as wet as a rat."

"Only my over coat," he answered, in a hoarse voice. "With your permission, I'll stop a minute in the hall and take it off."

He was a long time getting off his coat, and when he came in Mrs. Forrest was placing an ample meal on the table. The stranger walked to the window and looked out.

"You have a pretty place here," he said. "At least, it must be an attractive place in good weather."

"Yes," answered the old nan, with a sigh, "we are fond of the old house and its surroundings."

"Do you live alone here?"

"As you see," he answered, shortly. He thought the stranger too inquisitive. "But dinner is ready. Take a seat."

The traveler noticed that at one place there was a handsome china plate, and in a glass near it a bouquet of white crysanthemums and red geraniums. Naturally supposing it was a seat of honor appropriated to guests, he moved towards it. "Not there, sir!" she cried. "Please take this seat."

"Excuse, me, madam, as he took the indicated place. "I'm afraid you will be disappointed in the guest you expect, the storm is so severe. But he ought to have tried to come! There should be no vacant place at a Thanksgiving dinner."

"It is always vacant, sir," Mr. Forrest said. "It's a notion of my wife's to keep it for our boy, who left us fifteen years ago. You see, she has always kept his plate on the yearly returns of these days, and puts a bouquet of his favorite flowers near it. It seems to do her good to think he will come back some day."

"He will come back to it," she said, quietly. "I've always felt sure that my boy would sit there face to face with me some day."

The stranger's face worked convulsively. He suddenly moved toward the seat and held out his arms to her. "Mother! mother!" he cried, with tears filling his eyes. "Don't you know me? Father, mother, I've come back to you!"

She fell in his arms with a glad cry, But the father made one step forward and fell unconscious on the floor. It was so unexpected, so almost impossible, that the shock overcame him. But joy seldom kills, and he was soon restored to consciousness, and learned with a feeling of rapture, such as for many years he had not experienced, that his son had come back a reformed man.

"I did not mean to run away when I left the house," David said. "It was only when paying the money to Mr. Rapp that I realized the depth of my degradation, and I felt as if I could never look either of you in the face again. I shipped as a sailor in a vessel bound to Brazil, and when it reached there I left it. and found work up the country. I did not write, for I thought you'd rather think of me as dead. My business prospered, and then after I had accumulated some property, I began to long for home, and for mother and for you. And so I have come to see if you still care enough for me to take me back."

It was a Thanksgiving supper they had that night, for the interrupted dinner had been entirely forgotten. Do you think that three happier people could have been found in the world on that Thanksgiving Day?

The Chinese Thanksgiving.

The most popular Chinese holidays, aside from their New Year, is their "Poh Yueh Shiwo," or the fifteenth day of the eighth moon, which comes off this year on the twentieth of September.

It is the famous "Moon-Cake Day," or the Harvest Moon Thanksgiving day of the Chinese all over the world. The principle feast upon this occasion is the famous Moon-Cake, or "Yueh Bian," made in the shape of a London pork pie. The interior of these cakes is composed of five different species of nuts, such as walnuts, chestnuts, almonds, etc., well roasted. The whole are then mixed in a candied substance calculated to make it durable for years after it is taken out of the oven.

One of these cakes will weigh nearly a pound, and is sold here at twenty to twenty-five cents per pound. The contents of these cakes are said to represent all the virtue of a productive earth; in other words they contain all that which is good out of the soil for the entire year. The man that partakes of such a cake has, therefore, many causes to return thanks to the god of heaven, or "Shin," and to "Givan Goon De Shin," or god of earth.

And they do render thanks with a vengeance, as far as outward demonstration is concerned, in the several temples here in New York upon their glorious "Poh Yueh Shiwos."

From as early as nine o'clock in the morning to late in the night, upon that memorable occasion, Democratic Chinese as well as Republican heathens and half civilized Christians will wend their way quietly toward the various shrines of the josses in this city to burn their incenses, and offer their roasted pigs and chickens and countless yards of eloquently written prayers of thanks, which the devotees, on account of other business elsewhere, burn before their gods to save time.

After this they will feast upon the sacrificial meats, and then retire upon the sidewalk, if the weather permit, to gaze attentively at her celestial majesty, "The Moon," in whose honor the feast and cake are named.

It is supposed that on that memorable night, or the next morning there will be at least 400,000,000 Chinamen trying to see if they can behold the familiar figure of the Emperor Zoon Wong upon the moon.

This emperor is said to have suddenly got mad at his subjects some thousands of years ago, and fled to the moon, where he has ever since ruled that little empire.

Women as Collectors.

The avenues of employment of women are constantly increasing. Already she has proved herself a good clerk, a good book-keeper and a good type-writer, and the latest is a female collector. At least a dozen houses in Kansas City are employing women in this capacity, and their number seems to be constantly increasing.

A woman may be a book-keeper or a type-writer and yet be the most feminine creature imaginable, despite her business relations, says the Kansas City Star, but the female dunner would seem to be another kind of business woman, and she brings forward very promptly the question of how much distinction must be made between a woman and a man in the same business. One thing is certain, one cannot kick a lady collector out of the office.

The female collectors are for the most part young women, and, according to their employers, they are as persistent and as successful in their business as men. Their mode of operation, however, is somewhat peculiar, and they do not seem to go about the collection of a bill the same way as a man. A reporter happened in an office where fifteen or twenty young men were working. While he was talking with the manager a well-dressed young woman walked in and inquired for one of the young men. He was pointed out to her, and while the whole office watched her she walked over to his desk and began a conversation with him in a tone so low no one could hear. After talking for a few moments she turned to go, and rising her voice, said:

"If you don't come in and settle I'll be around again on Saturday."

When she was gone the young man came in for an unmerciful guying, and it is safe to say he made a desperate effort to pay the bill before Saturday. She was the collector for a jewelry firm.

A merchant who has adopted the new scheme was asked about it, and said: "I find that my lady collector is persistent, faithful and trustworty, and has great success in making some very bad collections, and I don't see why a lady should not be permitted to ask for the payment of a bill if she can do almost every thing else about an office."

The Conductor's Romance.

Come out with me a moment while we pass slowly at first and gradually faster through the street of an old-fashioned town. You will observe that the dapper Pullman car conductor, with his blue uniform and gilt buttons, is also on the rear platform.

Very proper, indeed, you say, for the conscientious to be keeping a lookout for that second section of our train.

Well, I didn't insinuate that the conductor was misbehaving himself, but I must disabuse your mind of the conception that he is looking for nothing more interesting than a locomotive and a train of cars, which the admirable block system of the Pennsylvania road is certain to keep at a safe distance from us. He didn't button up his coat just now and brush it; he didn't set his cap knowingly over his blonde bang, or pull up a tag of his white handkerchief so as to set off his manly chest, for the purpose of impressing you or me.

Now please keep still and see what our good-looking young guardian in blue is up to.

He is on the platform with us—that is, he has one foot on the platform and one foot on the first step below it. Now comes the critical moment!

Did you see him lift his cap? More, did you see that graceful girl leap out from a doorway, shoot a sheaf of arrows in a second from her eyes, wave a handkerchief and dart back again into the old brick house with its white portico of wood?

A romance on the rail to be continued, perhaps to the altar, from day to day. That is all.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Election Bets.

Here are a few of the sily things which men have agreed to do in case of losing election wagers. Of course you haven't done so:

Trundle a wheelbarrow through the streets.

Run the gauntlet between two rows of men armed with clubs.

Canvass for the sale of sewing machines and give the profits to the winner.

Sit astradle of the ridge-pole of a barn for ten hours.

Shave the crown of the head.

Wear a petticoat.

Walk on the hands and kneese.

Sweep the street with a broom.

Swim a river.

Get drunk.

Wear a straw hat on Christmas day.

Eat a quart of raw oatmeal.

Shovel snow off the neighbor's walks all winter.

Walk barefooted a long distance.

It Helps Trade.

From the Chicago Herald.

A man who rushes into a place hurriedly and asks for small change for a bill is considered a blooming nuisance in all first-class commercial centers, and the inventor of the patent cash register is hailed as a public benefactor in these quarters. Why? Well, because it is impossible to open the drawer of the register to get change unless a sale is "rung up." In consequence the applicant for change is obliged to make a purchase before he can be accommodated. This helps trade and creates a good excuse to starve off people who want a bill broken for nothing.

We are always ready to answer any questions which may be asked us concerning political issues, but when a man writes to know whether a reduction of the wool tariff will affect the price of flannel cakes he exhibits a levity totally out of place in a "campaign of intellect."—Terre Haute Express.

Thanksgiving Cooking.

The Turkey.—For the highest gastronomic effects it must be a young hen turkey, killed after a fast of twenty-four hours, and, if the weather is cold, allowed to hang four or five days before cooking. If just before the sacrifice you give the victim a spoonful of the best vinegar, it will "die gamer," that is, the meat will be whiter, tenderer and sweeter. Of course, you know how to clean and truss the bird, so we will proceed at once to the dressing. To half a pound of the sweetest bread crumbs, add half a pound of boiled mashed potatoes, a quarter of a pound of the best butter, sweet marjoram, summer savory and salt, pepper and a little grated nutmeg by the way of seasoning; a small portion of the best sausage meat, chopped mushrooms (if you can get them, about a quarter of a pint can), a few boiled chestnuts reduced to a paste, aud the grated rind of one lemon. The mushrooms will add a crowning and superb relish to your turkey, not to be obtained by any other means. Baste frequently while roasting and allow at least two hours for a ten pound turkey. When it is done to an elegant brown color, place it on your largest and handsomest dish and serve with the rich brown gravy sauce made of the drippings. You will have celery the whitest and crispest and ruby jelly with your turkey. For vegetables you can hardly do better than serve mashed potatoes, also browned sweet potatoes.—[Rural New Yorker.

Cream Chickens.—Boil the chickens until done, then cut the meat into square pieces. Take equal quantities of milk and cream and the broth, thicken slightly with flour, and add cayenne pepper to taste. Cut bread into squares, butter it and brown it in the oven, and garnish the dish when the chicken is served in the mixture.

Oyster Soup.—Cut the blanched parts of a bunch of celery into dice, and cook until tender, but not watery, in a pint of slightly salted water; take out the celery with a strainer, add the liquor from a quart of oysters, and skim until clear. Put in the oysters and as soon as the beards begin to open pour into the tureen, into which you have previously put a pint of boiling milk and butter the size of an egg. The seasoning should be added just before the oysters are put in. The celery may be served with a white sauce as vegetable.

Salad of Mixed Fruits.—Put in the centre of a dish a pineapple, properly pared, cored and sliced, yet retaining as near as practicable its original shape. Peel; quarter and remove the seeds from four sweet oranges; arrange them in a border around the pineapple. Select four fine bananas, peel and cut into slices lengthwise; arrange these zig-zag, fence fashion, around the border of the dish. In the V-shaped spaces around the dish put tiny mounds of grapes of mixed colors. When complete the dish should look appetizing. To half a pint of clear sugar syrup add half an ounce each of brandy, Maraschino and Curacoa; pour over fruit and serve.

Apple Puffs.—Pare, core and slice six tart apples, stew them and strain them through a colender, sweeten and add a pinch of salt, let this cool. Cut puff paste into pieces four inches square put a small spoonful of sauce to one-half the square moisten the paste around it with water and fold the other half over it; make the edges perfectly smooth; bake in a dripping-pan lined with paper, in a quick oven. When taken from the oven, sift powdered sugar over each puff.

Protection Against Prairie Fires.

Every prairie town where the people are not actuated, as they frequently are, by a spirit of criminal carelessness, is surrounded by a fire break: This is usually made by plowing a few furrows just outside and entirely around the town. Further out, say 120 yards, another circle of furrows is made, and then the grass is buried between. This effectually prevents any hostile fire from taking the city. It very often happens that this fire break is constructed after the fire which it is intended to guard against has appeared. On such occasions, while one party goes out with brooms, shovels, old grain sacks and other weapons to stay the progress of the fire as much as possible, another attaches teams to all the plows that can be found and begins to make the needed furrows. The attacking party is usually headed by the mayor, while the justice of the peace, or the leading lawyer, is apt to lead the plow brigade. As soon as the furrows are turned the "back fire" between is started, and usually the town is saved. Perhaps the people get a great deal more enjoyment out of it than if the matter had been attended to while the danger was remote.—New York Tribune.

How Lions Transact Their Business

Lions, as a rule, hunt in family parties. A very old lion, not infrequently incapacitated from taking an active part in pursuing game, is generally to be found at the head of such a coterie, and on him devolves no unimportant part of the programme.

Down to leeward, a hundred or more places below, where the draft bullocks are made fast when a train halts for rest, the young and active males and lionesses place themselves behind what available cover is to be found. This being done, the old lion goes to windward of the encampment and shakes out his abundant mane in the breeze, so that the odor from it may be carried down to the excited draft animals.

One sniff to the tainted breeze brings every ox to his feet in a moment; then standing, often trembling with fear, they gaze with dilated eyes into the impenetrable darkness. Closer and closer approaches the aged lion to his victims shaking and reshaking the dense, tawny covering of his forequarters.

HE IGNORED QUARANTINE.

A townsman down in the fever belt,
With a flushed and serious face,
Rushed into a meeting the other day
At the health officials' place
And said he would like to say a word
Regarding the news that had been heard.

"The news?" they said, "any news! tell quick,
For there's life and death at stake!"
"What! the new arrival you do not know?
Then a quarantine you make,
For one ignored your legal frown
And boldly came into this town!

"He loudly, strongly asserts his right;
Nor will he tell his name;
He passed your bounds and broke your laws—
But he tells not whence he came.
But list! the worst I have not told:
His face and hands are yellow as gold!"

With faces pale and with quivering limbs,
But with angry, quick assent,
Each quarantine man his shotgun seized,
And rushed with mad intent——
"Hold, not so fast—too late to fight—
'Twas only a baby, born last night.

Their Thanksgiving.

A True Story of the War.

"Aunt Eva, do let's keep Thanksgiving!"

Aunt Eva dropped the lint she was picking, and smiled at the handsome, boyish face that was turned to her.

"Keep Thanksgiving, Roy!" she said. "Where did you get that Yankee idea?"

"I don't care if it is a Yankee idea, Aunt Eva. Why shouldn't Old Virginia have a Thanksgiving day as well as any other state?"

"Torn in two by this dreadful war, old Virginia has little to give thanks for, just now, dear; but if the blessed day ever dawns that brings us peace, I'll keep it as devoutly as the most loyal Yankee does Thanksgiving, Roy."

"Aunt Eva coaxed the boy, "you might let Daisy and me keep it, anyhow. I reckon we have the best and dearest auntie in the world. Neither the Yankees nor the Johnnies have done us much harm, and Mammy Minty hasn't run off as all the other darkies have done. Now isn't all that something to give thanks for?"

"Well, dear, I'll think of it!" and Aunt Eva took up her lint with a sigh, while Roy sauntered down the wide hall, and then stretched himself lazily on the broad, porch steps.

It was a lovely October day. Not a sound broke the stillness save occasional buzz of a belated bee, or whir of a bird's wings as they bore it southward. A hazy mist hung like a golden veil edged with faint purple over the landscape, almost hiding from the boy's eyes the old city of Alexandria, which lay in the distance.

Usually Alexandria was as sleepy and quiet as the day itself, but of late it was filled with the noise and bustle of tramping host. Here were now hospitals and rests for the union soldiers; here the loyal governor of Virginia had his headquarters, and its streets were constantly filled with Union troops coming and going to and from the field.

Turning his head another way, from his quiet porch-observatory, Roy could almost see the tenting ground of a Confederate company.

So closely did the two lines come together here, it was only by maintaining the strictest neutrality that the inmates of the Willoughby farmhouse had so far dwelt in safety, although very harmless foes to either side might have been considered Miss Eva Sands, her little orphan neice and nephew and Mammy Minty the only remaining slave of the many who three years ago had inhabited the row of slaves' quarters that stood just back of the large, pleasant farmhouse.

As Roy lay in the sunshine dreamily watching his sister Daisy's busy fingers also picking white linen into shreds, he became conscious of the distant tramp of swift-coming horses.

Running down the walk he saw a squad of blue-coated cavalry go sweeping by. Hardly had they vanished up the right branch of the road, that forked just beyond the gate, when the summer stillness was again broken by the quick heat of horses' feet and a troop of Confederate soldiers, led by the dreaded Col. Mosby himself, came swiftly in sight.

They galloped past the excited boy to the forks of the road and then paused irresolutely.

"Did they go up or down, I wonder?" the leader said; then catching sight of the boy leaning on the fence, he cried:

"Which way?"

"Up!" Roy answered, startled at the sudden question, and then his heart gave a great throb, for he knew he had given information to an enemy, a thing his aunt had so often cautioned him never to do, and that the consequence might be terrible for him.

"How many men were there, boy?"

But Roy was on his guard now and answered quickly:

"I cannot tell."

"You can give an idea I reckon; was there one company or two?"

"I must not tell, sir."

"Must not tell, you little Yank!" exclaimed an officer, springing off his horse, "I say you shall!"

"Come, come, captain: we have no time to lose here. Forward men!" exclaimed the leader, as putting spurs to his horse he dashed forward, followed by his men in hot pursuit.

Roy turned to go to the house, happy over his escape from the soldier's wrath, when a distant cloud of dust warned him that another body of horsemen was approaching and in a few minutes a company of bluecoats galloped swiftly up, and stopped as the Confederates had done at the branching roads.

Again Roy heard the question, "Which way did the soldiers take, boy?" but Roy was not to be caught so soon again and answered firmly:

"We'uns are neutral, captain, and I dasn't tell."

"Look here, boy, didn't you tell the Jonnies who just went by which road our boys took?"

Roy flushed crimson.

"Yes," he answered, for Roy had been taught to speak the truth. "But I was very sorry I did it. I did not think."

"Sorry!" exclaimed the officer impatiently.

"Captain I have had enough of these copper-head neutrals. I order this boy under arrest as a spy. You men are witnesses he has confessed to giving information to the enemy, and I mean to clear the country of these dangerous citizens."

It was only a moment. Daisy heard her brother call her, and ran down the walk just in time to get one agonized hug, and hear him whisper:

"Oh, Daisy, I didn't mean any harm! They are taking me to Alexandria. Kiss auntie good-by!"

Then there was a clatter of hoofs, a jingling of spurs, a flash of blue coat and sabres in the sunshine, and Roy was gone.

* * * * * * * *

"A little girl to see you, governor!" and the loyal governor of Virginia tured with a cordial smile to greet the visitor who was being ushered in.

The governor was a great lover of children; a houseful of his own had only enlarge the true father heart that beat within him, but even had he lacked this the little girl who now greeted him would have enlisted his sympathies at once.

She was about fourteen years old but very slight for her age; while a wealth of blonde hair that clustered in tiny curls about her forehead and then hung in heavy braids to her waist, only added to the childish look of her sweet pale face; and the big brown eyes that grew dark and earnest as she talked, pleaded for love and kindness, while her flushed cheeks and quick breath betrayed her fear at finding herself alone with the "War Governor."

"What can I do for you, my child?"

The kindly voice gave her a little courage and she cried:

"Oh, your excellency, give me my brother, my twin brother! He is all I have, governor; there was only Roy and me, and they have sent him to the penitentiary for a spy. Think of mamma in heaven seeing her boy in such a place. He has no one to kiss good-night, and how can I pray 'keep us out of temptation, with Roy in that dreadful place? And we were going to keep Thanksgiving!"

"My dear child!" exclaimed the bewildered governor, "what do you mean?"

Then by careful questions, little by little, the governor obtained the whole story, and having that big, father heart he was greatly touched and interested by it, but unfortunately poor Roy had been sent to a northern penitentiary, over which the southern governor had no control.

It was fortunate, however, that this man was not one to sit idly by when there was a wrong that he could help to right, and so, after thinking a few minutes, he said;

"Miss Daisy, tell your auntie I want to take you over to Washington the day after to-morrow; we need only be gone three or four hours, but, who knows, perhaps in that time you can unlock the heavy gates of Sing-Sing penitentiary itself. So cheer up, little one!"

Then turning to his private secretary, he said:

"Colonel, please collect all the letters in this case, and have them ready for me tomorrow."

* * * * * * * *

It was ten o'clock of a dreary November day, and President Lincoln sat at his desk, hastily but wearily glancing over a pile of cards sent in by the waiting host in the ante-chamber. Presently one caught his eye, and he turned to the door-keeper.

"John, show in Grover Pierpont."

A minute later the governor entered, leading a little, shrinking, black-robed figure. There was a cordial greeting between the two gentlemen, and then Grover Pierpont said, cheerily:

"Mr. Lincoln, you have asked me for a great many men, now I am going to just ask one boy of you. Miss Daisy, will you tell the president who he is, and why we want him?"

Until now, Daisy had been too frightened to raise her eyes from the floor, but when a pleasant voice said, kindly:

"Well, sissy, who is this boy the governor wants?" she looked up and her fear fled.

It did not seem possible at first that the quiet, gentle looking man sitting opposite her and patiently waiting for her to speak, could be the great Mr. Lincoln, the dreadful, Yankee president, but as she gazed at him, almost fascinated the governor's voice reminded her of her errand.

"Miss Daisy, tell him about Roy."

Oh, yes, she could do that; and with a little, silent prayer, "Oh, mamma in heaven, if you are your children's guardian angel, put words into my mouth to save your boy," she began her story.

She told how she and Roy had been left to Aunt Eva, how careful they had been never to give either army any information, of their plans for keeping Thanksgiving day, of the sudden approach of the troops and the startled boy's unguarded answer; then she described their hurried parting and the lonely days at the farmhouse since; she told of their efforts to see Roy in prison, "but we only saw him once again," she said; "it was when they were taking him away. Aunt Eva and I got as close to the cars as we could, but not near enough to speak; we saw him, though, and I waved my hands. He saw us, too, and tried to smile, but his eyes were too full of tears. Then I threw him kisses, but he could not throw us any, because"—the child's head drooped and her voice choked—"his hands were fastened."

She stopped, and silence fell on the little groupe for a moment; then the governor, hastily passing his hand over his eyes, glanced at the president. He had risen, and stood with his hand on Daisy's shoulder, while two tear drops were slowly moving down his cheek.

"Is this a true story, governor?" he asked, at last.

"It is true, Mr. Lincoln. I have here the necessary papers to prove every item."

"Will you endorse them?"

"With the greatest pleasure, Mr. Lincoln."

"Then Sissy, you may go home and tell Aunt Eva that Roy will help you to keep Thanksgiving day."

"Oh, Mr. Lincoln——" but Daisy could go no farther; she could only seize the hand that was already writing an order for Roy's release, and kiss it over and over.

After a few minutes she took out of a little well-worn purse two ten dollar gold pieces, and, holding them out, said timidly:

"Will you please tell me how to send these to Roy? Mamma gave us each one as a keepsake, but I thought she would want me to spend it to bring Roy home; he has no money, you know."

The president extended his hand.

"Give me your money," he said. I will send it to him myself."

Daisy laughed a happy, little laugh.

"Oh, thank you, over and over!" she cried. "Now I'll be sure he will get it, and dear Mr. President are you sure he will be home for Thanksgiving?"

"I am as sure as I am that there is no Thanksgiving day in old Virginia, and never has been, has there, governor?

"No!" laughed that gentleman, but sure as I am governor next year there shall be one, Mr. President."

And then, after heartily shaking the president's hand, the governor and Daisy returned to Alexandria.

* * * * * * *

Thanksgiving day at the Willoughby farm came at last. "Oh, how gladly we shall keep it, if he only comes!" Aunt Eva said over and over.

"If he only comes!" All day long Daisy's eager, impatient feet had carried her up and down the path to the farm gate. All day long Aunt Eva's sweet face had turned to the door at the slightest sound outside. All day long Mammy Minty had been adding one dainty to another until even her skill had been exhausted in their composition.

"Dey'll taste mighty good to dat pore honey, arter de prison's cookin', bress he heart!"

But patient or impatient will not bring our loved one any sooner, and at last, "the day died sobbing on the western hills." Aunt Eva would not light the candles just yet.

"I will make the day last as long as I can," she thought, "the night will be so long and hard!"

Daisy had ceased her journeys to the gate, and sat with her face glewed to the window, her heart growing faint and sick as the lengthening shadows fell.

"The president has so many cares," she thought. "What wonder if he forgot a homesick boy in the faraway penitentiary; or, perhaps, he did neglect to send the money, and Roy is now alone and penniless in some distant northern city."

"Roy! Roy!" she cried at last, as the last gleam of daylight faded, and she started to her feet; "I shall die if you do not come to-night!"

"Then I'm glad I'm here, Daisy!"

There was a rush of boyish feet, and Daisy felt her brother's arms around her, while Aunt Eva's arms were round them both, and Mammy Minty, standing in the doorway, clapped her hands softly as she sobbed over and over:

"Bress de Lord! Bress de Lord and Massa Lincum!"

Surely if Thanksgiving day is kept by the giving of thanks, it was never more devoutly observed than by the Willoughby household that night. How eargerly Daisy told her story and Roy his. How breathlessly he listened as Daisy related word for word "just what our dear president said!"

"Wasn't it too good of him, Roy," she concluded, "to take the trouble to even send the money to bring you home himself?"

"Yes," Roy assented, "and here it is; when the papers came to let me return, there was a private note from the president himself, enclosing the money and saying I was to be sent home free of charge."

Daisy took the two pieces of gold in her hand.

"It seems as if mamma had helped too, dear," she said, "and I can't think of anything to say, except what Aunt Minty does, 'Bless the Lord, bless the Lord and Massa Lincum!'"

A Novelette.

New York Evening Sun.

They were seated on the tete-a-tete his left arm encircling her waist and her right hand nestling in his, while her sunny head—which in the dimly lighted parlor offered no suggestion of the proximity of a white horse—reprose on his well-padded shoulder.

The grate fire threw out a grateful warmth and as he sat there, occasionally inhaling the faint, sweet perfume of her breath, he was very, very happy.

But the demon of unsatisfied longing to have her tell him again how much she loved him made him speak.

"Claribel," said he, "are you sure you would be true to me, even though my wealth should vanish and I be a pauper?"

"Oh, Petey," she answered, with a reproachful look, disengaging herself, "how can you for an instant question my love, when you know I refused Tom Plunger for you—Tom, who was so handsome and made me so many beautiful presents?"

"But," he persisted, "but—"

"Why do you hesitate, my own darling?" she asked encouragingly.

"Well, my sweet, you remember it was only after Tom went broke on the Futurity that you finally consented to be mine."

Her eyes now had a far-way look in them; and a regretful sigh escaped her as she murmured, half unconsciously: "That's when I was foxy."

IN TWO HALVES.

The Story of a Divided Bank Note.

THE FIRST HALF.

Wet and dreary. It is midwinter; the scene is Kirklington, on the London and Northwestern; the time one-quarter to eleven; just after the night mail had flashed through without stopping—bound for Liverpool and the north. The railway officials are collecting preparatory to going off duty for the night.

"Where's Dan?" asked one of the crowd upon the platform.

"I saw him in the hut just after the one quarter to eleven went through. Can't have come to any harm surely?"

"No; he said he'd seen something drop from the train, and he went down to the line to pick it up."

And Dan had picked up something. It was a basket, a common white wicker basket, with a lid fastened down by a string. What did it contain? Dirty clothes? What?

A baby—a child half a dozen weeks old, no more.

"Where did you come across it?" asked one.

"Lying on the line, just where it fell. Perhaps it didn't fall, perhaps it was chucked out. What matter? I've got it, and got to look after it, that's enough for me!"

The little mite's linen was white and of the finest material, but he lay upon an old shawl and a few bits of dirty flannel. All they found was a dilapidated purse, a common snaplock bag-purse of faded brown leather. Inside was a brass thimble, a pawn-ticket, and the half of a Bank note of England note of £100.

* * * * * * * *

A new parson—Harold Treffry—had come lately to Kirklington.

He is now paying a round of parochial visits, accompanied by an old college chum, who is spending Christmas with him.

"Yonder," said Treffry, pointing to a thin thread of smoke which rose from some guant trees into the sullen wintry air, "yonder is the house—if, indeed, it deserves so grand a name —the hovel, rather, of one whose case is the hardest of all the hard ones in my parish. This man is a mere hedger and ditcher, one who works for any master, most often for the railway, but who is never certain of a job all the year around. He has a swarm of young children, and he has just lost his wife. He is absolutely prostrated; aghast probably at his utter incapacity to do his duty by his motherless little ones. I wonder whether you could rouse him? If you could only get him to make a sign, or cry, or laugh, or to take the smallest interest in common affairs. Jack, I believe you're the very man. You might get at him through the children—that marvellous hanky-panky of yours, those surprising tricks; a child takes to you naturally at once. Try and make friends with these. Perhaps when the father sees them interested and amused he may warm a little, speak, perhaps approve, perhaps smile, and in the end give in. Jack, will you try?"

Jack Newbiggin was by profession a conveyancer, but nature had intended him for a new Houdin, or a wizard of the North. He was more than half a professional by the time he was full grown. In addition to the quick eye and the facile wrist he had the rarer gifts of the suave manner and the face of brass. He had even studied mesmerism and clairvoyance, and could upon occasion surprise his audience considerably by his power.

They entered the miserable dwelling together. The children—eight of them—were all skirmishing over the floor, except one, a child of six or seven, a bright-eyed, exceedingly beautiful boy, the least—were not nature's vagaries well known—likely to be born among and belong to such surroundings, who stood between the legs of the man himself, who had his back to the visitors, and was crouching low over the scanty fire.

The man turned his head for a moment, gave a blank stare, then an imperceptible nod, and once more he glowered down upon the fire.

"Here, little ones; do you see this gentleman? Tommy?" catching up a mite of four or five from the floor. "No, not you; nor you, Sarah; nor you Jakey"—and he ran through all their names.

"They had now ceased their gambols and were staring hard at their visitors—the moment was propitious; Jack Newbiggin began. He had fortunately filled his pockets with nuts, oranges and cakes before leaving the parsonage, so he had half his apparatus ready in hand.

The pretty boy had very soon left the father at the fire and had come over to join in the fun, going back, however, to exhibit his share of the spoil and describe voluminously what had occurred. This and the repeated shouts of laughter seemed to produce some impression on him. Presently he looked over his shoulder and said—but without animation:

"It is very good of you, sir, surely very good for you to take so kindly to the little chicks. It does them good to laugh a bit, but it ain't much as they've had to make 'em lately."

"It is good for all of us now and again, I take it," said Jack, desisting and going towards him, the children gradually collecting in a far off corner and comparing notes.

"You can't laugh, sir, if your heart's heavy; if you do it can be only a sham."

While he was speaking he had taken the Bible from the shelf, and resuming his seat began to turn the leaves over.

"I'm a rough untaught countryman, sir, but I have heard tell that these strange things you do are only tricks; ain't it so?"

Here was indeed a hopeful symptom. He was roused then to take some interest in what had occured.

"All tricks, of course; it all comes of practice," said Jack, as he proceeded to explain some of the simple processess, hoping to enchain the man's attention.

"That's what I thought, sir, or I'd have given you a job to do. I've been in want of a real conjuror many a long day, and nothing less'll do. See here, sir," he said as he took a small, carefully folded paper from between the leaves of the Bible, "Do you see this?"

It was half a Bank of England note for £100.

"How, sir, could any conjuror help me to the other half.

"How did you come by it?" asked Jack at once.

"I'll tell you, sir, short as I can make it.

Dan then described how he had picked up the basket from the 10:45 Liverpool express.

"There was the linen; I've kept it. See here; all marked quite pretty and proper, with lace round the edges, as though its mother loved to make the little one smart."

Jack examined the linen, it bore a monogram and crest. The first he made out to mean H. L. M., and the crest was plainly two hammers crossed, and the motto, "I strike"—not a common crest—and he never remembered to have seen it before.

And was that all?

"'Cept the bank note. That was in a poor, old purse with a pawn-ticket and a thimble. I kept them all."

Like a true detective Jack examined every article minutely. The purse bore the name Hester Gorrigan, in rude letters inside, and the pawn-ticket was made out in the same name.

THE SECOND HALF.

When Jack Newbiggin got back to the parsonage he found that his host had accepted an invitation for them both to dine at the "Big House," as it was called, the country seat of the squire of the parish.

"I have been fighting your battles all day," began Mrs. Sitwell, the hostess, when seated at dinner next to Jack.

"Was it necessary? I should have thought myself too significant."

"They were talking at lunch of your wonderful tricks in conjuring, and some one said that the skill might prove inconvenient—when you played cards, for instance.

"A charatible imputation; with whom did it originate?"

"Sir Lewis Mallaby."

"Please point him out to me."

He was shown a grave, scowling face upon the right of the hostess —a face like a mask, the surface rough and wrinkled; through which the eyes shown with baleful light, like corpse-candles in a sepulchre.

Jack let his companion chatter on. It was his habit to get all the information possible about any company in which he found himself, for his own purpose as a clairvoyant, and when Mrs. Sitwell flagged he piled her with artless questions, and led her on from one person to another, making mental notes to serve him hereafter. It is thus by careful and laborious preparations that many of the strange and seemingly mysterious feats of the clairvoyant conjuror are performed.

When the whole party are assembled in the drawing room after dinner a chorus of voices, headed by that of the hostess summoned Jack to his work. There appeared to be only one dissentient, Sir Lewis Mallaby, who not only did not trouble himself to back up the invitation, but when the performance was actually begun was at no pains to conceal his contempt and disgust.

The conjuror made the conventional plum pudding in a hat, fired wedding rings into quartern loaves, did all manner of card tricks; knife tricks, pistol tricks, and juggled on conscientiously right through his repertory. There was never a smile on Sir Lewis's face; he sneered unmistakably. Finally, with a ostentation that savored of rudeness, he took out his watch, a great gold repeater, looked at it, and unmistakably yawned.

Jack hungered for that watch directly he saw it. Perhaps through it he might make its owner uncomfortable, if only for a moment. But how to get it into his hands? He asked for a watch—a dozen were offered. No, none of these would do. It must be a good watch—a repeater. Sir Lewis Mallaby's was the only one in the room, and he at first distinctly refused to lend it. But so many earnest entreaties were added to him, the hostess lending the attack, that he could not in common courtesy continue to refuse.

With something like a growl he took his watch off the chain and handed it to Jack Newbiggin.

A curious, old fashioned watch it was, which would have gladdened the heart of a watch collecter—all jewelled and enamelled, adorned with crest and inscription—an heirloom, which had probably been in the Mallaby family for years. Jack looked it over curiously, meditatively; then, suddenly raising his eyes, he stared intently into Sir Lewis Mallaby's face and almost as quickly dropped them again.

"This is far too valuable," he said courteously, "too much of a treasure, to be risked in any conjuring trick. An ordinary modern watch I might replace, but not a work of art like this."

And he handed it back to Sir Lewis, who received it with ill concealed satisfaction. He was as much pleased, probably, at Jack's expression of possible failure in the proposed trick as at the recovery of his property.

Another watch, however, was pounded into a jelly and brought out whole from a cabinet in an adjoining room.

"Oh, but it is too preposterous," Sir Lewis Mallaby was heard to say, quite angrily. The continued applause profoundly disgusted him. "This is the merest charlatanism. It must be put an end to. It is the commonest imposture. These are things which he has coached up in advance. Let him be tried with something which upon the face of it he cannot have learned before-hand by artificial means."

"Try him, Sir Lewis, try him yourself," cried several voices.

"I scarcely like to lend myself to such folly or encourage so pitiable an exhibition."

But he seemed to be conscious that further protest would be in Jack's favor; so he said, "Can you tell what I have in this pocket?" He touched the left breast of his coat.

"A pocketbook."

"Bah! Every one carries pocketbook in his pocket."

"But do you?" asked several of the bystanders, all of whom were growing deeply interested in this strange duel.

Sir Lewis Mallaby confessed that he did, and produced it—an ordinary morocco leather purse and pocketbook, all in one.

"Are you prepared to go on?" said the Baronet, haughtily, to Jack.

"Certainly."

"What does this pocketbook contain?"

"Evidence."

"Evidence of what?

"Of facts that must, sooner or later, come to light."

"What ridiculous nonsense! I give you my word this pocketbook contains nothing—absolutely nothing—but a Bank of England note for £100."

"Stay!" said Jack Newbiggin, facing him abruptly and speaking in a voice of thunder. "It is not so—you know it—it is only the half!"

And as he spoke he took the pockbook from the hands of the really stupefied Baronet and exhibited for inspection—the half of a Bank of England note for £100.

There was much applause at this harmless and successful denouncement of what threatened at one stage to lead to altercation, perhaps to a quarrel. But Jack Newbiggin was not satisfied.

"As you have dared me to do my worst," said he, "listen now to what I have to say. Not only did I know that was only the half of a note, but I know where the other half is to be found."

"So much the better for me," said the Baronet, with an effort to appear humorous.

"That other half was given to—shall I say, Sir Lewis?"

Sir Lewis nodded indifferently.

"It was given to one Hester Gorrigan, an old nurse, six years ago."

"Silence! Say no more," cried Sir Lewis in horror.

Sir Lewis had been a younger son; the eldest inherited the title, but died early, leaving his widow to give him a posthumous heir, the title remaining in abeyance until time showed whether the infant was a boy or a girl. It proved to be a boy, whereupon Lewis Mallaby, who had the first information of the fact, put into execution a nefarious project which he had carefully concocted in advance. A girl was obtained in a foundling hospital and substituted by Lady Mallaby's nurse, who was in Lewis's pay for the newly born son and heir. This son and heir was handed over to another accomplice, Hester Corrigan, who was bribed with £100, half down, in the shape of a half-note, the other half to be paid when she announced her safe arrival in Texas with the stolen child. It occurred to Mrs. Corrigan in her transit between London and Liverpool that though £100 would be acceptable on her arrival, the child would be only an incumbrance. She therefore threw the basket containing him out of the window, forgetting that in it she had for safety deposited her purse.

It was the watch borrowed from Sir Lewis Mallaby which first aroused Jack's suspicions. It bore the same crest—two hammers crossed, with the motto "I strike"—which was marked upon the linen of the child that Dan Blockitt picked up at Kirklington station. The initial of the name Mallaby coincided with the monogram H. L. M. From these facts and what he had been told by Mrs. Sitwell, Jack rapidly drew his conclusions, and made a bold shot, which hit the mark as we have seen.

Lewis Mallaby's confession, combined with that of Mrs. Gorrigan, who was found by the police, soon reinstated the rightful heir, and Dan Blockitt in after years had no reason to regret the generosity which had prompted him to give the little foundling the shelter of his rude home.—London Tid-Bits.

The Iron Prince and His Son Drinking Beer Together.

From the London Figaro.

Events point to the conclusion that Count Herbert von Bismarck is likely to take his father's place in something more than a merely nominal way. Whenever he goes emperors and kings make a point of doing him honor, and he brought away from Italy with him a present placed in his hand by the King himself, and worthy of its honor. It is a drinking cup of large size of chased silver, and has evidently been suggested by the masterpieces of Benvenuto Cellini. The cup rests upon lions' heads, and on its side are the combined arms of Italy and Germany, while on the cover are exquisitely-modeled figures of Justice, Force, Prudence, and— of course, with no ironical intention—Temperance! So pleased, was Count Herbert that he took this cup with him when he went to see his father at Fredricchsruh on his return, and it is said that the Chancellor, ringing for a servant, had the beaker filled with German beer, in which he and his son drank to the Italian and German alliance.

Fills a Long-Felt Want.

From the Ogle County Reporter.

The latest invention to hang in the family dining room is the gum board. It is a neat little circular board, decorated or plain, fastened to the wall. The name of each of the family is painted on the circumfereze, and marks the spot where the gum is left until wanted. This saves carrying the gum to bed and getting it in one's hair or swallowing it in the night. It is obvious that the gum board supplies a long-felt want, and he who invented the new fad will have the best whishes of the young ladies.

A stout elderly lady was hanging by a strap and casting black looks at inoffensive, but ungallant dude, who sat sucking the head of his cane; a sudden lurch of the car flung the lady upon him with great force. "Say, dash it, don't you know," exclaimed the youth, "you've crushed my foot to a jelly?" "It's not the first time I've made calf's-foot jelly," retorted the woman, severely, as he vanished and she prepared to sit down.

REV. DR. TALMAGE.

What he had to Say on Sunday About the Parable of the Talents, and a Practicle Application to Every Day Work.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 18. At the Tabernacle, Rev. T. DeWitt, Talmage D. D., took for his text:

"Unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one: to every man according to his several ability." Matt. xxv., 15.

He said: "Many of the parables of Jesus Christ were more graphic in the times in which he lived then they are now, because circumstances have so much changed. In olden times, when a man wanted to wreak a grudge upon his neighbor, after the farmer had scattered the seed wheat over the field and was expecting the harvest, his avenger would go across the same field with a sack full of the seed of darnel grass, scattering that seed all over the field, and of course it would sprout up and spoil the whole crop; and it was to that Christ referred in the parable when he spoke of the tares being sown among the wheat. In this land our farms are fenced off, and the wolves have been driven to the mountains, and we cannot fully understand the meaning of the parable in regard to the shepherd and the lost sheep. But the parable from which I speak today is founded on something we all understand. It is built on money, and that means the same in Jerusalem as in New York. It means the same to the serf as to the Czar, and to the Chinese coolie as to the Emperor. Whether it is made out of bone or brass, or iron or copper or gold or silver, it speaks all languges without a stammer. The parable of the text runs in this wise: The owner of a large estate was about to leave home, and he had some money that he wished properly invested, and so he called together his servants, and said:

"I am going away now, and I wish you would take this money and put it to the very best possible use, and when I come back return to me the interest." To one man he gave $9,400, to the others he gave lesser sums of money; to the least he gave $1,880. He left home and was gone for years, and then returned. On his arrival he was anxious to know about his worldly affairs, and he called his servants together to report to him. "Let me know," said he, "what you have been doing with my property since I have been gone." The man who had received the $9,400, came up and said: "I invested that money. I got good interest for it. I have in other ways rightly employed it; and here are $18,800. You see I have doubled what you gave me." "That's very good," said the owner of the estate, "that's grandly done. I admire your faithfulness and industry. I shall reward you. Well done—well done." Other servants came up with smaller accumulations. After a while, I see a man dragging himself along, with his head hanging. I know from the way he comes in that he is a lazy fellow. He comes up to the owner of the estate and says: "Here is that $1,880." "What!" says the owner of the property, "haven't you made it accumulate anything?" "Nothing—nothing." "Why, what have you been about all these years?" "Oh, I was afraid that if I invested it, I might somehow lose it. There are your $1,880." Many a man started out with only a crown in his pocket and achieved a fortune, but this fellow of my text with $1,880 has gained not one farthing. Instead of confessing his indolence he goes to work to berate his master, for indolence is most always impudent and impertinent. Of course, he loses his place and is discharged from the service. The owner who went out into the far country is Jesus Christ going from earth to heaven. The servants spoken of in the text are members of the church. The talents are our different qualifications of usefulness given in different proportions to different people. The coming back of the owner is the Lord Jesus returning at the judgment to make final settlement. The raising of some of these men to be rulers over five or two cities, is the exaltation of the righteous at the last day, while the casting out of the idler is the expulsion of all those who have misimproved their privileges.

Learn first from this subject, that becoming a Christian is merely going out to service. If you have any romantic idea about becoming a Christian, I want to scatter the romance. If you enter into the kingdom of God it will be going into plain, practical, honest, continuous, persistent Christian work. I know there are a great many people who have fantastic and romantic notions about this Christian life, but he who serves God, with all the energies of body, mind and soul is a worthy servant. When the war trumpet sounds, all the Lord's soldiers must march, however deep the snow may be, or however fearful the odds against them. Under our government we may have colonels, and captains, and generals in time of peace, but in the Church of God there is no peace until the last great victory shall have been achieved. But I have to tell you it is a voluntary service. People are not brought into it as slaves were dragged from Africa. A young man goes to an artisan and says: "Sir, I want to learn your trade. I by this indenture, yield myself to your care and service for the next four, or five or seven years. I want you to be my master, and I want to be your servant." Just so, if we come into the kingdom of God at all, we must come, saying to Christ: "Be thou my master. I take Thy service for time and for eternity. I choose it." It is a voluntary service. There is no drudgery in it. In our worldly callings sometimes our nerves get worn out, and our heads ache, and our physical faculties break down; but in this service of the Lord Jesus, the harder a man works the better he likes it, and a man in this audience who has been for 40 years serving God, enjoys the employment better than when he first entered it. The grandest honor that can ever be bestowed upon you, is to have Christ say to you on the last day: "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

Learn also from this parable that different qualifications are given to different people. The teacher lifts a blackboard, and he draws a diagram in order that by that diagram he may impress the mind of the pupil with the truth that he has been uttering, and all the truths of this bible are drawn out in the natural world as in a great diagram. Here is an acre of ground that has 10 talents. Under a little culture, it yields 20 bushels of wheat to the acre. Here is another piece of ground that has only one talent. You may plow it, and harrow it, and culture it, year after year, but it yields a mere pittance. So here is a man with 10 talents in the way of getting good and doing good. He soon, under Christain culture, yields great harvests of faith and good work. Here is another man who seems to have only one talent, and you may put upon him the greatest spiritual culture but he yields but little of the fruits of righteousness. You are to understand that there are different qualifications for different individuals. There is a great deal of ruinous comparison when a man says: "Oh, if I only had that man's faith, or that man's money, or that man's eloquence, how I would serve God." Better take the faculty that God has given you and employ it in the right way. The rabbis used to say that before the stone and timber were brought to Jerusalem for the temple every stone and piece of timber was marked, so that before they started for Jerusalem the architects knew in what place that particular piece of timber or stone should fit. And so I have to tell you we are all marked for some one place in the great temple of the Lord, and do not let us complain, saying: "I would like to be the foundation stone or the cap stone." Let us go into the very place where God intends us to be, and to be satisfied with the position. Your talent may be in personal appearance; your talent may be in large worldly estate; your talent be in high social position; your talent may be in a swift pen or eloquent tongue; but whatever be the talent it has been given only for one purpose—practical use. You sometimes find a man in the community of whom you say, "He has no talent at all;" and yet that man may have a hundred talents. His one hundred talents may be shown in the item of endurance. Poverty comes, and he endures it; persecution comes, and he endures it; sickness comes, and he endures it. Before men and angels he is a specimen of Christian patience, and he is really illustrating the power of Christ's gospel, and is doing as much for the church, and more for the church, than many more positively active. If you have one talent, use that; if you have 10 talents, use them, satisfied with the fact that we all have different qualifications, and that the Lord decides whether we shall have one or whether we shall have 10.

I learn also from this parable that the grace of God was intended to be accumulative. When God plants an acorn he means an oak, and when he plants a small amount of grace in the heart, He intends it to be growthful and enlarged until it overshadows the whole nature. There are parents who, at the birth of each child, lay aside a certain amount of money, investing it, expecting by accumulation and by compound interest that by the time the child shall come to midlife, this small amount of money will be a fortune, showing how a small amount of money will roll up into a vast accumulation. Well, God sets aside a certain amount of grace for each one of His spiritual children at his birth, and it is to go on, and, as by compound interest, accumulate until it shall become an external fortune. Can it be possible that you have been acquainted with the Lord Jesus for 10, 20, 30 years, and that you do not love him more now than you ever did before? Can it be that you have been cultured in the Lord's vineyard, and that Christ finds on you nothing but sour grapes? You may depend upon it, if you do not use the talent that God gave you, it will dwindle. The rill that breaks from the hillside will either widen into a river or dry up. The brightest day started in the dim twilight. The strongest Christian man was once a weak Christian. Take the one talent and make it two; take five and make them ten; take ten and make them twenty. The grace of God was intended to be very accumulative.

Again, I learn from the text that inferiority of gifts is no excuse for indolence. This man, with the smallest amount of money, came growling into the presence of the owner of the estate, as much as to say: "If you had given me $9,400 I would have brought $18,800 as well as this other man. You gave me only $1,800, and I hardly thought it was worth while to use it all. So I hid it in a napkin, and it produced no result. It's because you didn't give me enough." But inferiority of faculties is no excuse for indolence. Let me say to the man who has the least qualifications, by the grace of God he may be made almost omnipotent. The merchant, whose cargoes come out from every island of the sea, and who by one stroke of the pen, can change the whole face of American commerce, has not so much power as you may have before God, in earnest, faithful and continuous prayer. You say you have no faculty. Do you not understand that you might this afternoon go into your place of prayer, and kneel before God, and bring down upon your soul, and the souls of others, a blessing so vast that it would take eternal ages to compute it? "Oh," you say, "I haven't fleetness of speech. I can't talk well. I can't utter what I want to say." My brother, can you not quote one passage of scripture? Then, take that one passage of scripture; carry it with you everywhere; quote it under all proper circumstances. With that one passage of scripture you may harvest a thousand souls for God. I am glad that the chief work of the church in this day is being done by the men of one talent. Once in a while, when a great fortress is to be taken, God will bring out a great field piece and rake all with the fiery hail of destruction. But common muskets do most of the hard fighting. It took only one Joshua, and the thousands of common troops under him to drive down the walls of cities, and, under wrathful strokes, to make nations fly like sparks from the anvil. It only took one Luther for Germany, one Zwinglius for Switzerland, one John Knox for Scotland, one Calvin for France, and one John Wesley for England. Dorcas as certainly has a mission to serve as Paul has a mission to preach. The two mites dropped by the widow into the poor-box will be as much applauded as the endowment of a college, which gets a man's name into the newspaper. The man who kindled the fire under the burnt offering in the ancient temple had a duty as imperative as that of the high priest, in magnificent robes, walking into the holy of holies under the cloud of Jehovah's presence. Yes, the men with one talent are to save the world, or it will never be saved at all. The men with five or ten talents are tempted to toil chiefly for themselves, to build up their own great name, and work for their own aggrandizement, and do nothing for the alleviation of the world's woes. The cedar of Lebanon standing on the mountain seems to hand down the storms out of the heavens to the earth, but it bears no fruit, while some dwarf pear tree has more fruit on its branches than it can carry. Better to have one talent and put it to full use than 500 wickedly neglected.

My subject teaches me that there is going to come a day of solemn settlement. When the old farmer of the text got home he immediately called all the servants about him and said: "Here is the little account I have been keeping. I want to see your account, and we will first compare them; and I'll pay you what I owe you, and you'll pay me what you owe me. Let us have a settlement." The day will come when the Lord Jesus Christ will appear, and will say to you: "What have you been doing with my property? What have you been doing with my faculties? What have you been doing with what I gave you for accumulative purposes?" There will be no escape from that settlement. Sometimes you cannot get a settlement with a man, especially if he owes you. He postpones and procrastinates, and says: "I'll see you next week," or, "I'll see you next month." The fact is, he does not want to settle. But when the great day comes of which I am speaking, there will be no escape. We will have to face all the bills. I have sometimes been amazed to see how an accountant will run up or down a long line of figures. If I see 10 or 15 figures in a line, and I attempt to add them up, and I add them two or three times, I make them different each time. But I have admired the ways an accountant will take a long line of figures, and without a single mistake, and with great celerity, announce the aggregate. Now, in the last settlement, there will be a correct account presented. God has kept a long line of sins, a long line of broken Sabbaths, a long line of profane words, a long line of discarded sacrements, a long line of misimproved privileges. They will all be added up, and before angels, and devils, and men, the aggregate will be announced. Oh, that will be the great day of settlement. I have to ask the question: "Am I ready for it?" It is of more importance to me to answer that question in regard to myself than in regard to you; and it is of more importance for you to answer it in regard to yourself than in regard to me. Every man for himself in that day. "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." We are apt to speak of the last day as an occasion of vociferation—a great demonstration of power and pomp; but there will be on that day, I think, a few moments of entire silence. I think a tremendous, an overwhelming silence. I think it will be such a silence as the earth never heard. It will be at the moment when all nations are listening for their doom.

I learn also from this parable of the text that our degrees of happiness in heaven will be graduated according to our degrees of usefulness on earth. Several of the commentators agree in making this parable the same one as in Luke, where one man was made ruler over five cities and another over two cities. Would it be fair and right that the professed Christian man who has lived very near the line between the world and the church—the man who has often compromised his Christian character—the man who has never spoken out for God—the man who has ever been known as a Christian only on communion day—the man whose great struggle has been to see how much of the world he could get and yet win heaven—is it right to suppose that that man will have as grand and glorious a seat in heaven as the man who gave all his energies of body, mind and soul to the service of God? The dying thief entered heaven, but not with the same startling acclaim as that which greeted Paul, who had gone under scorchings, and across dungeons, and through maltreatments into the kingdom of glory. One star differs from another star in glory, and they who toil mightily for Christ on earth shall have a far greater reward than those who have rendered only half a service.

Some of you are hastening on toward the reward of the righteous. I want to cheer you up at the thought that there will be some kind of a reward waiting for you. There are Christian people in this house who are very near Heaven. This week some of you may pass out into the light of the unsetting sun. I saw a blind man going along the road with his staff, and he kept pounding the earth and then stamping with his foot. I said to him: "What do you do that for?" "Oh," he said, "I can tell by the sound of the ground when I am near a dwelling." And some of you can tell by the sound of your earthly pathway that you are coming near to your father's house. I congratulate you, Oh, weather-beaten voyagers, the storms are driving you into the harbor. Just as when you were looking for a friend, you came up the gate of his house, and you were talking with your servant, when your friend hoisted the window and shouted: "Come in! come in!" Just so, when you come to the gate of the future world, and you are taken with death, the black-porter at the gate, methinks Christ will hoist the window and say: "Come in! come in! I will make thee ruler over 10 cities." In anticipation of that land I do not wonder that Augustus Toplady, the author of "Rock of Ages," declared in his last moment. "I have nothing more to pray for; God has given me everything. Surely no man can live on earth after the glories I have witnessed." Oh, my brothers and sisters, how sweet it will be, after the long wilderness march, to get home. That was a bright moment for the tired dove in the time of the deluge when it found its way safely into the window of the ark.

A Great District.

The banner congressional district of that United States is the Fourth of Minnesota. The man who represents that district in congress has a constituency such as no colleague can boast. When, following the census of 1880, an apportionment was made placing St. Paul and Minneapolis in the same district, their conbined census population was put at less than 90,000. Now the man who speaks for these cities alone at Washington has more than 400,000 people behind him. When we add to this the population of all the counties included, we get an enormous total. Returns which are pretty nearly exact show that the aggregate vote in this district at the last election was something over 80,000. This is nearly three times as great as the entire vote of the State of Georgia in the congressional election of 1884. It is nearly half as much more as the entire vote of the State of Florida, either in the election of 1886 or for president in 1884. It is greater than the entire vote cast for president in 1884 by Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island or Vermont, and almost the same as the entire vote of New Hampshire. Even at this election, with its intensity of interest and the unprecedented fullness of its vote, there are several states in which fewer ballots were cast than in the Fourth district of Minnesota alone. The absurdity which confines the representation of half a million or more people in congress to a single man is unavaidoble where the growth of commonwealths is as rapid as is this. The rule of apportionment followed is one adapted to the conditions prevailing in general; and exceptional prosperity must take its reduced representation as an accompaniment of its advantages. This disproportion must exist through not only this but another congress; for the election of 1890 will occur before census results are known, and before any new apportionment can be made By the year 1892, when the first election under a new distribution will occur, each of these cities, even with the larger unit of population that is sure to be adopted, will be entitled to more than one representative on its own account. Meantime the people of the Fourth district can be proud of their greatness, proud of the magnificent majority by which they have rescued this great community from Democratic representation, and proud of the gallant young Republican whom they have sent to Washington.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Pen Picture of the Midnight Sun.

The midnight sun is thus described in "Jubilee Jaunt to Norway": Imagine yourself on a ship at anchor looking west or straight in front of you. There is a broad expanse of sea a little to your right hand, behind you will be the rugged coast, and to your left the long, narrow fiord between the island and the mainland that the steamer has just traversed. You watch the sun as it slowly, slowly sets; the island and the coasts look like a rich, dark purple, and the shadows cast by the ship's mast, etc., grow longer and longer. After a bit, when the sum had sunk apparently twelve feet from the horizen, it stops and seems to remain stationary for about twenty minutes; then the very seagulls hide away, while the air all on a sudden strikes chilly. Each one has an awed, expectant feeling, and surrounding even the tourist steamer broods a silence that may be felt. Soon the sun rises very slowly once again, and the yellow clouds change with his uprising to even greater beauty, first to the palest primrose and then to a bluish pink. The sky, which was just now rose-color, becomes gray, then pale emerald green, and lastly blue. Rock after rock stands out, caught by the sun's bright rays, and the reign of day has begun once more.

Mind Your Business.

Not long ago almost in mid-ocean, two Danish steamers crashed into each other, and one went to the bottom with more than a hundred souls. Whose fault was it? The answer is, "Nobody's."

The other day near Wilkes Barre, in Pennsylvania, one section of a heavy excursion train, packed with humanity, crashed into another, and a hundred human beings were killed—crushed, mangled, torn, burned, scalded. O, the pity of it! Fathers, mothers, brothers, wives, sisters, and sweet-hearts, sent to untimely graves. Whose fault?

"Nobody's."

To give this answer indeed, to an intelligent creature! Any dog knows better. It is always somebody's fault. It is some one's criminal neglections, and ought to be a hanging offense every time for somebody.

If you attend to your business, it will never be your fault that life or property is sacrificed; but if you think there are some little mattes you can let slide and no harm will come, some day you will regret it for harm will come. Mind your business.

Embroidered Trousers.

Paris Cable.

Fashionable young men are now to be made happy by the biggest news of all—that fashion will let them wear their trousers embroidered this winter. Not all old-fashioned waistcoat, but evening dress trousers will be decorated down the sides with rich black silk embroidery worked on a broad stripe of the best black piece silk. Here, perhaps, is the entering wedge at last.

Of late he has been making his headquarters at Merrillan, and there got to drinking again.

An Armed Camp.

From the New York Herald.

The condition of Europe is summed up in the phrase, "An armed camp." This is the high water mark of the civilization of the ninteenth century. Italians, Frenchmen, Germans, Austrians—amiable, well-meaning, neighborly beings, who live, believe, love, toil, kneel before the same altar, and yet all of them buisy in the same fearful preparation for throat cutting. "An armed camp" means war at any time—to-morrow, next year, surely some day, for war alone will dissolve the camps. They represent the nervous impatience of the kings. The people may take them in hand and make the close of the ninteenth century as memorable with their protest as the close of the eighteenth.

RAILWAY ADVENTURE

She was a Russian lady, the Countess Marie Baranow, a very great lady, exquisitely handsome. You know how beautiful the Russian women are, at least how beautiful they seem to us, with their fine noses, delicate mouths, eyes rather close together and of indescribable grayish blue, and that cold grace of theirs, a little severe. They have something about them at once wicked and seductive, haughty and gentle, tender and harsh, which is very charming to a Frenchman. But, after all, it may be only the difference of race and type which causes me to see so much in them.

Her physician had for several years tried to induce her to settle in the south of France, as he observed that she was threatened with consumption. But she obstinately refused to leave St. Petersburg. Finally, last autumn, believing her life at stake, the doctor warned her husband, who immediately ordered his wife to leave for Menton.

She took the train, choosing to remain all by herself in the car, while her servants occupied another compartment. She leaned out at the door, a little sad, as she watched the fields and villages pass by—feeling herself very issolated, very lonely in that life of hers, without children, almost without relatives, with a husband whose love had grown cold, and who was sending her thus far away to another part of the world, without so much as offering to accompany her—just as he would send a sick patient to the hospital.

At each station her servant Ivan regularly came to the door to find if his mistress needed anything. He was an aged domestic, blindly devoted to her, and ready to fulfill any order that she could possibly give him.

Night came on and the train was rushing forward at full speed. She could not sleep for excess of nervousness. Suddenly the idea occurred to her to count the money her husband had placed in her hand at the last moment—in gold coin of France. She opened her little bag and emptied the shining mass of metal into her lap.

Just then a whiff of cold air smote her in the face. She lifted her head in surprise. The door of the railroad car had just opened. Hastily the Countess Marie dropped her shawl over the money lying in her lap and waited. A second later a man entered, bareheaded, wounded in his hand, panting violently, and attired in evening full dress. He closed the door, sat down, gazed at his neighbor with glittering eyes and commenced to bind a handkerchief about his bleeding wrist.

The young woman felt herself ready to faint with fear. That man certainly must have seen her counting the gold and he had come in only to rob and murder her.

He kept his gaze upon her, still out of breath as he was, his face working strangely, as though he were preparing to leap upon her.

Then he said, sharply:

"Don't be afraid, madam!"

She could not speak; there was a sound of buzzing in her ears, and she could hear her own heart beat.

He spoke again: "I am not a criminal, madam."

Speechless with fear, she could answer nothing; but in the sudden movement of her start at the sound of his voice, her knees coming together caused the gold to trickle down upon the floor, piece by piece, as the water trickles from a spout.

The man observed with surprise the falling stream of gold pieces, and suddenly bent down to pick them up.

Then, wild with fear, she rose to her feet, dropping all her fortune on the floor, and rushed toward the entrance to leap out upon the track. But he comprehended what she was going to do, and turning, seized her in his arms, resented her by force, and grasping her wrists, exclaimed:

"Listen to me, madam, I am not a robber; and the proof is that I am going to pick up all your money and give it back to you. But I am a lost man—I am a dead man—if you do not aid me to pass the frontier. I can tell you nothing more. In another hour we shall reach the last Russian station; in one hour and twenty minutes we shall cross the frontier line. If you do not succor me, I am lost. And nevertheless, madam, I swear to you that I have not killed anybody, or stolen anything, or done one dishonorable act. This I swear to you. But I cannot tell you anything more."

And going down upon his knees, he picked up every coin to the last, seeking the gold pieces under the benches, and grasping after those which had rolled into obscure places. Then, when the little leather bag was full again, he handed it to his neighbor without a word, and retired to a corner of the car, where he sat down.

Neither of them made the least movement. She remained motionless and dumb, still faint with terror, but gradually becoming calm. As for him, he made not a gesture, not a sign; he remained sitting erect and immobile, with eyes looking straight before him, and so pale that he seemed to be dead. From time to time she cast a quick side glance at him, which was as quickly turned away. He was a man of about 30, very handsome, with all the outward appearance of a gentleman.

The train rushed out through the darkness, flinging out its piercing shrieks to the night, sometimes slackening its pace a moment, only to start off again under full steam. But at last its course became steadily slow; it whistled several times, and stopped short.

Ivan appeared at the door to receive orders.

The Countess Marie gave a final look at her strange traveling companion, and then said, brusquely, to her servant:

"Ivan, thou wilt now return to the count; I shall have no more need of thee."

Stupefied, the man opened his eyes enormously. He began to stammer out:

"But—Varine!"

"No, thou shalt not come; I have changed my mind; prefer thou shouldst remain in Russia. Here, this is the money to pay thy way. Give me thy cap and cloak, quickly!"

Dumfounded, the old servant took off his cap and cloak, obeying without a word—accustomed as he was to the sudden whims and irresistible caprice of masters. And he went his way with tears in his eyes.

Again the train started, making for the frontier. Then the Countess Marie said to her neighbor:

"These things are for you, sir. You are now my servant, Ivan. I place but one condition upon what I do—namely, that you never speak to me, that you do not utter one single word, neither to thank me nor for any other cause whatsoever."

The stranger bowed without speaking.

Soon they stopped again, and uniformed officials entered the train. The countess showed them her papers, and pointing to the man seated in the further end of the car, said:

"That is my servant Ivan, and this is his passport."

The train moved on.

For the rest of the night they sat alone together, without speaking.

At dawn, as they halted at a German station, the stranger got out.

Then, standing before the window of the car door, he said:

"Pardon me, madam, for breaking my promise, but as I have deprived you of your servant it is just that I should replace him. Do you need anything?"

She replied, coldly:

"Go and tell my waiting maid to come."

He did so and disappeared.

But later on, when she got out to take some refreshments, she saw him standing at a distance, watching her. And they arrived at Menton.

The doctor paused at this stage of the story. After a few moments he resumed.

"Well, one day, as I was receiving clients in my office, a fine, tall man came in, who said to me:

"Doctor, I come to ask you for news of the Countess Marie Baranow. I am—although she does not know me—a friend of her husband."

I replied:

"There is no hope for her, I regret to say. She will never return to Russia."

And all of a sudden the man burst into a passion of sobs; then he rose and staggered from the room like a drunken man.

The same evening I told the countess that a stranger had called at my office to inquire about her health. She seemed to be affected, and then told it to you. And she added:

"That man, whom I do not know, now follows me everywhere, like my shadow. I meet him every time I go out; he looks at me in a strange way, but never speaks."

She paused thoughtfully a moment and then exclaimed:

"See! I am willing to wager that he is this moment before the window."

She rose from her reclining chair, went to the window, lifted the curtain aside, and there, sure enough, was the man who had come to my office sitting on a bench of the public promenade, with eyes fixed on the windows of the residence. He observed us, rose, and walked away without once turning to look.

Then I became the witness of a very astonishing thing—the mute love of those two beings, neither of whom knew the other.

He loved her with the devotion of a rescued animal—grateful and devoted to the death. He came every day to see me, with the question, "How is she?"—comprehending that I had divined his secret. And he used to weep fearfully at seeing her passing by, whiter and weaker every day.

She would say to me:

"I only spoke once to that singular man, and it seems to me as though I had known him for twenty years."

And whenever they met she returned his salute with a grave and charming smile. I felt that she was happy, all lonely as she was, and knowing herself doomed to die—I knew that she felt happy just at being loved in that strange way, with such respect and such constancy, with such romantic exaggeration, with such supreme devotion. And for all that, still obstinate in her exaltation, she persistently and desperately refused to receive him, to learn his name, or to speak to him. She would always say:

"No, no! It would spoil this strange friendship. We must always remain unknown to eachother."

As for him, he was certainly Quixotic, for he never tried to bring himself any nearer to her. He had resolved to keep to the very end the absurd promise he had made her in the railroad car.

Very often during her long hours of weakness she would get up from her reclining chair and peep through the curtains to see if he was there—under her window. And when she had seen him, always sitting motionless on his bench, she would go back and lie down with a smile on her lips.

She died at last one morning—about 10 o'clock. As I was leaving the house I saw him hastening to me, with agony in his face—he already knew all.

"I would like to look at her for one second," he said "in your presence."

I took his arm and re-entered the house.

When he found himself beside the death bed he seized her hand and kissed it with an interminable kiss, then he rushed away like a mad man.

The doctor paused again, and added:

"That is certainly the strangest railroad adventure I ever knew. And I must say it taught me what queer fools men can be."

Then a woman murmured, in a half audible voice:

"Those two people were not so foolish as you think—they were—they were"—

But she cried so that she could not speak. And as they changed the subject of conversation in order to calm her, no one ever knew what she had been trying to say.—Translated from the French for the Boston True Flag.

How Married Life Can be Made a Heaven on Earth to Both.

Of the duties of husband and wife, one to the other, the Queen advises the young married woman to try and realize when she returns from the honeymoon trip, that holiday is over and workday life has begun. She need not be unhappy because she is busy, on the contrary; but she has duties, and must take them up, and one of them is the happiness of her companion, which is practically in her hands.

To begin with, try and arrange your household to suit his tastes and wants; study his ways and wishes, and let him see you do so. One of the virtues a man greatly affects is punctuality, therefore try and cultivate it. Always be ready in time, and have all your arrangements ready. If he is late, wait of course. But when he sees you wait he will seldom, if ever, keep you waiting. If men grieve or annoy you, try and bear it patiently, and as a mistake on their part; never treat it as a willful unkindness or inattention, and above all remember men are not as women, and things that set a woman's nerves all a-tingle and send the hot blood straight to her head or heart, are passed by men with utter unconcern, even if they chance to noitce them, which they often do not. In fact, few things astonish men more about women than the way the latter resent and get excited over words and events the former consider the merest trifles. Remember, if your husband is to like home, he must be taught to look for his comfort there. If he is a smoker, don't say he may smoke all over the house, but fit him up some tiny corner where he can have his pipes and his writing table—his room—to be invaded by no one, not even yourself, without his permission. Many a nervous, overworked man, whose temper is a burden to himself and all around him, would become soft and genial if he knew that a cozy little den awaited him at home, warm in winter, cool in summer, his wife trim and neat as in early days, ready to meet him with a pleasant smile.

That some husbands are not amenable to such treatment may be true enough; where is the general rule without an exception? But the critical time of young married life is the first year or so, and on this depends almost entirely the future of the couple.

Migration of Birds.

The migration of birds is beset with many perils and many difficulties. Birds often lose their way; a contrary wind or a spell of dark, cloudy weather appears to disorganize their movements, and, like mariners without a compass, they are at a loss which direction to take. Many wonderful scenes are witnessed at the lighthouses on some parts of the British coasts during the season of migration. Sometimes, when the moon is suddenly hidden by a bank of clouds, the lanterns of the lighthouses are the point to which the stream of migrants hasten, and where in a confused fluttering throng they beat against the glass like moths round a candle, and fly to and fro, utterly bewildered and completely lost. They seem to have no idea of their true course, and fly aimlessly about, many killing themselves against the glass, others falling into the water below. The lightmen are alert on those occasions, and capture numbers of the poor lost traveler with hand nets. Many of the birds are too tired or too dazed to move, and allow themselves to be taken by the hand as they sit on the balcony. Let the readers represent to himself a lighthouse on one of these migration nights. The tide of migration is at its height. The night is dark and the lanterns are the central point of attraction for the countless hosts of birds that were crossing the sea when the sky became overcast. Birds of many different species are flying together, or are attracted from all points of the compass by the brilliant light. Ducks and geese are traveling with gold crests and swallows. Starlings and finches are flying side by side with gulls and waders. Warblers and herons scatter scientific classification to the winds, and fraternize with swans and goatsuckers and larks. Falcons and owls appear to lose all propensity for preying on their helpless fellow-voyagers, and fly harmlessly to and fro among their companions in misfortune. As soon as the weather clears, and the moon shines forth once more, the birds appear to get on their right track again, and the feathered hosts are gone as suddenly as they came. These migratory movements lend bird life its greatest charm in Autumn.—Good Words.

From Book Talk.

It is told of a book publisher of Toronto that he wrote to an American author whose book he proposed to republish, offering him a cent a copy if the author would furnish the stereotype plates. The author replied that he wanted ten cents a copy, whereupon the Canadian wrote that he would rather make new plates and that the book would be out about September 8. The author kept quiet until September 6 and then wrote to the Canadian publisher saying that he ought, perhaps, to tell him that the book that he proposed to pirate had been copyrighted in England. As the English copyright holds in Canada, the Toronto man has a set of plates that he will sell cheaply.

Mr. Blaine and family will probably reside in Washington the coming winter, although he has not fully decided as yet.

The ancient custom of ringing the curfew bell has been resumed at Stratford-on-Avon, the same bell being used as that which was tolled at Shakespeare's funeral.

Word comes from Wheeling, West Virginia, that a live bat has been found there imbedded in solid rock in a crevice just big enough to contain it and utterly shut away from the outside world.

Texas papers claim to have a man in that State who is 115 years old. A man who stood it 115 years in Texas ought not to be afraid to die and go to—any place to which he may be sent.

It was when the late Prof. Proctor was an English school examiner that a little girl defined the difference between a man and a brute as follows: "A brute is an imperfect beast; man is a perfect beast."

At last a burglar has been found under a bed. A woman found him. Thus is the labor of the sex for 500 years rewarded. The event occurred in Omaha, and the fame of the city is assured. The bed with an actual burglar under it is bound to thunder down the ages.

Sunflowers are used in Wyoming Territory for fuel. The stalks, when dry, are as hard as maple wood, and make a hot fire, and the seedheads with the seed in are said to burn better than hard coal. An acre of sunflowers will furnish fuel for one stove for a year.

An ingenious inventor has devised a new screw—half nail and half screw two blows of the hammer, two turns of the screw driver, and it is in. Its holding power in white pine is said to be 332 pounds, against 298 pounds, the holding power of the present screw.

Dr. Marie Haslep, who went from Indianapolis, Ind., last spring, as medical missionary to China, writes home that she does no shopping in Wuchang, as it would be dangerous even to ride in an open chair on some of the streets. She never walks unaccompanied, even on the private streets.

Nearly all the coachmen of Philadelphia have a pecular disgruntled expression on their faces. The case of this is that their mistresses, bowing to the dictates of fashion, will not allow them to wear mustaches. The average coachman is very proud of this hirsute adornment, and it goes rather hard with him to part with it. One coachman offered to work for $5 less per month if allowed to retain his mustache.

A Montreal boy waited with bated breath while the doctors relieved him of a fish hook he had swallowed while eating a pop-corn ball. The Montreal Witness says the lad's father bought three balls, and found in each one of the hooks, "which are placed there, it is said, as a surprise for the consumer." These hooks should make it easy to catch the manufacturer, and he shouldn't be surprised, in that event, if he should be landed in the penitentiary.

I doesn't pay to write letters. Nobody knows this better than Lord Sackville, the British Minister who recently got his walking papers from this government, and judge Denny, who has just lost a fat job as legal adviser of the King of Corea at a salary of $18,000 a year. Judge Denny sent a letter to United States Senator Mitchell, finding fault with the Viceroy of China. The letter was published and found its way to China, and now Judge Denny will come back to America.

The theory is held by Prof. Mendeleef that petroleum is produced by water, which penetrates the earth's crust, and comes in contact with the glowing carbides of metals, especially those of iron. The water is decomposed into its constituent gases, the oxygen uniting with the iron, while the hydrogen takes up the carbon. and ascends to a higher region, where part of it is condensed into mineral oil, and part remains as natural gas, to escape wherever and whenever it can find an outlet. If this assumpaion is correct, and a sufficient supply of metalic carbides is contained in the earth's interior, petroleum may continue to be formed almost indefinately, and yield a supply of fuel long after coal has become exhausted. Prof. Mendeleef supports his views by producing artficial petroleum in a manner similar to that by which he believes the natural product is made.

About Washington.

The Star of Washington says: A pretty strong candidate for the position of government printer under the new administration is said to be Mr. W. M. Meredith, the president of the Western Engraving and Printing company at Chicago. He has been foreman in several newspaper offices, and is said to be an expert practical printer. Other reasons given for his appointment are that he was in Gen. Harrison's regiment during the war, has since been on friendly terms with the president-elect, and was one of the most pronounced of the few Harrison men of Chicago when that city was wild with support of Judge Gresham.

Representative Woodburn of Nevada retired early one night at Washington and placed his vest under his pillow. The pockets contained $150 in cash, two railroad tickets from Morgan to San Francisco and return and a book of telegraph stamps. When he awoke next morning the vest and its contents were gone. A colored boy was arrested and confessed that he had taken the articles. He had thrown the tickets and telegraph stamps away and spent some of the money.

Record of Casualties.

Prof. Hutchinson, of the Stillwater high school and H. C. Hurd were drowned while skating on lake St. Croix

A mysterious case of poisoning happened in the family of Samuel Petterson, mayor of Piketon, Ohio. His two children visited their grandmother's shortly after dinner and were seized with convulsions. Their mother was sent for and fell in a convulsion on her way. Mr. Patterson while going for a physician also fell in convulsions. The mother and children have recovered, but Mr. Patterson is still in a dangerous condition.

Twelve thousand people witnessed a balloon ascension at Exposition Park at Columbus, Georgia. Prof. F. H. Vandergrift, made the assent. When the balloon reached an altitude of half a mile it suddenly burst and began to descend to the ground rapidly. Vandegrift cut the rope that held the parachute, and for a time it seemed that he would escape death. The parachute fell near the center of the Chattahoochie river, and Vandegrift was drowned. The unfortunate man was twenty-five years old. He was born in Virginia, and has been in the balloon business twelve years. He made his first leap with a parachute at Greenfield, Ohio, three months ago. The body was recovered, completely enmeshed in the ropes of the baloon. It will be embalmed and sent to Vandegrift's parents at Clinton, Mo.

Personal Talk.

Gov. McGill of St. Paul received a personal letter from President-elect Harrison, in which the latter expresses his great satisfaction over the result of the election in Minnesota. The letter is warm in sentiment and the President-elect congratulates the Republicans of Minnesota on their victory, and expresses his heartfelt appreciation of the handsome manner in which the Republicans of Minnesota stood by him through the campaign.

Man's Wicked Doings.

Taylor Smith, a well known sporting character, was killed at Springfield, Mo., by Margaret Miller, his mistress in a trivial dispute. Taylor and the woman were discussing a laundry bill, when she seized an ax and split his head open. He lived long enough to make an ante-mortem statement.

George Faebel, a member of the board o trade committed suicide by shooting himself at Chicago, It is understood that he lost about $40,000 in the September wheat corner, and despondency, growing out of the loss, is suppposed to have been the cause of the act.

Judge Black of Fort Benton, Montana, sentenced Charles Gordon to be hanged Jan. 11. Gordon murdered J. A. Lavalle at Choteau July 11 last. No provocation existed save an insult known only to Gordon. The evidence showed that the murder was cold-blooded and deliberate, as it was committed hours after the alleged insult, and not in the heat of passion.

Frank Vernon, aged fourteen, was arraigned on the charge of forgery. A cigar dealer charged that he obtained $5 from him on a forged order. Vernon is a precocious youth who ran away from home at Chicago to follow horse racing. He came to New York, where he developed into a regular sport.

Murderer Brown, alias Murphy, was taken to a place of safety from Moorhead, Minn. to avoid being lynched. Rumors were afloat to the effect that friends of the murdered policeman, Poull, would lead a mob and lynch Brown. The sheriff removed the prisoner, and thus foiled the would-be lynchers. His trial will occur at the January term of the district court Judge Mills presiding.

The government secret service at Buffalo, N. Y. has for the past few days been closing in around a gang of counterfeiters, who have been making dollars and half-dollars of a kind that was almost impossible to detect, and of which large quantities have been circulated in Erie, Warren, Oil City and Jamestown. Some of the gang are under arrest. "Squire" Richardson, one of the men, who, it is alledged, attended to the manufacture of the money, was brought to Buffalo. Richardson is fully sixty years old, It is thought he will squeal on the whole party.

That somebody with the evil intention of committing arson has been at work in St. Peter has been made evident. In one of the vacant basement rooms of the Gustavus Adolphus college it was discovered that a map had been placed in a small closet and set on fire, but the effort failed for lack of air. Next night the room was examined again, and it was found that straw had been set on fire in the closet and the plot had failed as before. A close watch is now being kept for the evil-doer.

A murder occurred near the Montgomery county line of Tennessee. Dr. J. G. Brake heard a noise in the horse lot. He went to the stable, when a man concealed behind a tree fired, and Brake reeled and started to fall. Two more shots were fired into his body and then the assassin beat his head into a jelly. Next day George Tally gave himself up, saying that he was the murderer and that he killed Brake because the latter had seduced his seventeen-year-old daughter. The girl is said to have borne an unsavory reputation, and the doctor stood high in the community.

A burglar went through three safes in adjoining buildings at Owatonna, Minn. Both B. J. Meixner, wagon manufacturer, and C. Zambari, gunsmith, had left their safes unlocked, there being nothing of value in either. No damage was done to either except that the iron money drawer of Meixner's, being locked, was carried away. At Kubat & Slezak's saloon the safe door was drilled and the lock was blown out of the door, but the bolts were not drawn and the money in the safe was not obtained. They took a small amount of change from the till and helped themselves to the fluids.

Pickpockets who had mingled with the immense throng, in one of the large State street dry goods stores at Chicago raised the cry of fire. Immediately a panic ensued. In the rush the weaker ones were knocked down and trampled upon. One of the large windows of the store was broken out, through which the crowd rushed into the street, scattering the goods in all directions. The fire alarm was turned in and the department was soon on hand, but it was discovered that there was no fire in the building. The presence of the engines added to the confusion. Many of the lady clerks in the store fainted and were carried away to a neighboring drug store. The pickpockets reaped a rich harvest.

Though the authorities refuse to talk about the recent big capture of counterfeiters in Western New York and Pennsylvania, a few facts have leaked out to show it to be one of the most important captures on record. The man Richardson, who was brought to Buffalo is not only seemingly respectable, but is in more than comfortable circumstances. He has a delightful home at Cassadaga, and is the father of two estimable daughters, almost grown. It is stated that the government has for years tried to get a case against Richardson, but never with much success until now. It is believed that for twenty years he has been making counterfeit money, and no man in the United States has been able to produce a spurious coin so near like the genuine as he. The other six men interested with him circulated the coin, but Richardson, it is alleged, was the manufacturer.

Jake and Joe Tobler (colored) were executed in Wichita, Kansas, in the presence of but a few people, by Federal authorities. While their legs were being pinioned prayers were offered by Mrs. Call, and at the suggestion of the prisoners, the services were brief. Just before the black caps were adjusted, Joe showed signs of a break-down. After the fall Jake never moved a muscle, while Joe, during the second minute, drew up his legs twice. The crime for which they were executed was the killing of Cass and Goodeykuntz near Sac and Fox agency in August, 1885. The murdered men were engaged in business at Vinita in the territory, and while on their way to Northern Texas camped about one mile from Sac and Fox agency. While asleep they were murdered. The Tobler boys were soon after arrested, with property of the murdered men in their possession, and confessed their guilt.

H. H. Scott, county surveyor of Pine county and justice of the peace in Hinckley, went from his place of business with his wife, Dr. Mary M. Scott, to the water tank of the Eastern Minnesota railway, of which S. K. Irvin was engineer, to settle some trivial affair. Mrs. Scott fearing that there might be some trouble, and seeing her husband put a revolver in his pocket, told him that she would go with him if he would leave the revolver at home. He made it appear that he had done so, but when they arrived at the tank and Mr. Irvin was accused of the deed, he denying it emphatically, Scott drew the revolver. Irvin, while trying to get the pistol from Scott, was shot dead. After Irvin was dead Scott shot him again in the head. Scott deliberately walked up town and gave himself up to Marshall Booth. They were both members of the G. A. R., and as far as their neighbors knew were good friends. They are both men of family and respected. The coroner's jury brought in a verdict of willful murder.

An interesting and sensational murder case terminated at Fort Smith, in a verdict of guilty, as to Henry Millers and William Woods, two prominent citizens of Donovan county, Kan., Nov. 25, 1887, Woods left home with John Hantz, an old schoolmate and friend, for a hunt in the Indian Territory. They subsequently picked up a companion in a stranger named Miller. They were gone three months, and were seen in various parts of the Choctaw and Cherokee nations. When they returned home Hantz was missing, and a searching party afterwards found his body in a river, face down and with a bullet hole in the back of his head. His watch was found in Miller's pocket. The evidence was purely circumstantial, and the recovery of the body was due mainly to the devotion of a pointer dog belonging to the murdered man. The dog refused to leave the place of its master's murder, and bayed continually until the body was found. Both Woods and Miller are respectable citizens of Kansas.

News Generalities.

A statement published at Helena shows that the mining companies of Montana for the first ten months of this year paid $2,800,000 in dividends, or more than one-fourth of all the United States during the same period. The total for the year will exceed $3,000,000.

The business circles of Clinton, Iowa, and vicininity were startled by the announcements that attachment suits had been begun against the saw mill firm of W. K. Anthony & Co., of Comanche, Iowa, and that the firm would have to go to the wall. The liabilities aggregate $160,000. It is believed by their friends that, if given time, the firm can recover and pay all claims.

Suits were filed in the district court of Iowa by the heirs of Horace Bacon to set aside a sale for taxes of lands which are now comprised in four important additions to Sioux City. The property is part of the business portion of the city, and is worth $2,000,000. The land was sold for taxes twenty years ago, and purchasers under the tax title have been endeavoring to buy out the heirs. The latter prefer to go into litigation.

Forty-six workmen societies of Milan, at a meeting, protested against the triple alliance and against war in general. A resolution was adopted declaring that they would not support the Italian government in the event of war. The protest will be sent to workmen's associations throughout Italy, and the workmen of France will be invited to adhere in the name of the brotherhood of labor. The Milanese workmen will ask other associations to co-operate.

At last the people in the stricken city of Jacksonville, Fla., and the refugees from it, may know what measures will be finally employed for the final disinfection of the town and where the losses will fall. A letter has been written by Surgeon General Hamilton to Surgeon Porter, in charge, to the effect that all articles necessary to be destroyed will be paid for. An ordinance will also be passed by the city council making it unlawful for any one to refuse to deliver up goods for the purpose of destruction or disinfecting. A permit must also be secured to carry through. the streets of the city any infected article. There are 22 new cases of yellow fever in the twenty-four hours ending at 6. p. m. Nov. 20.

According to a Kentucky gentleman, who is a friend of Senator Blackburn, any gentleman who consents to act as "the friend" of Judge Rucker will have to take the quarrel upon himself if the senator refuses to meet Judge Rucker on the ground that he does not consider him a gentleman. If Judge Rucker's friend, or second, were himself unobjectionable on this score, there would be no excuse under the code for the senator's declining to meet him in place of the principal. This might lead to a very awkward complication. A gentleman well acquainted with Judge Rucker, expressed the opinion that if Senator Blackburn refused to fight a duel he would be in danger of being shot down on the street the first time he and Judge Rucker should meet.

Destitution in Ireland.

The examination of witnesses from County Kerry was continued at the sitting of the Parnell commission. Mr. Leonard, agent of the estate of the earl of Kenmare, said the league was as active as ever. He thoroughly disagreed with the statement of Mr. Balfour, chief secretary for Ireland, that the league was a thing of the past. In his part of Kerry the fight that the league was making was at its hottest. The plan of campaign was all powerful. Formerly a writ could be executed by the sheriff with the aid of four policemen, but now 400 soldiers were required. The members of the league met every Sunday after attending mass to arrange the week's programme of rent resistance and intimidation. The resistance came from well-to-do people. Until the year 1881 the tenants had been friendly, but after the league was formed they scoffed at him and the landlords. On cross-examination witness admitted that in 1880 it was necessary to give the tenants some assistance, as some of them were blue with hunger. There were two thousand tenants on the Kenmare estates; two hundred of them, though very poor, had always tried to pay their rents. Since 1850 the earl of Kenmare had expended £173,000 in the improvement of his estate. His bill for labor now amounted to £300 weekly. Only such rent was taken from poor tenants as they could afford to give. Witness did not seek to collect rent from persons blue with hunger, and the law was never enforced against tenants of that class. The court adjourned. The clerk of the commission handed to Mr. Edward Harrington a summons to pay the fine of £500 which the court had imposed upon him for contempt. Mr. Harrington states that he will not pay the fine, and intends to question the right of the commision to enforce it.

Virginia Election Return.

Prof John M. Langston, who has returned to Washington, says that not only is he elected to congress from the Petersburg district of Virginia but that the lawful majority in the district will give the electoral vote of the state to Harrison and Morton. He thinks the dawn of absolute freedom for the colored people has appeared. He thinks the time has come to break up the solid South, that the way has been opened by him in his district. A Democratic editor from Virginia said:

There will undoubtedly be an investigation by the Republican house into the election in Wise's district—the Richmond district. It is a fact that when the polls closed there were 500 colored Republicans waiting in line to vote. They had been kept from voting by a trick that was resorted to which they did not understand. A constitutional amendment was submitted at the time by the legislature. The negroes were asked if they wished to vote for it. Few of them understood it, and the election officers deliberately read over the proposed amendment to them and explained it by the score. The purpose was, of course, to prevent them from casting their vote. There were almost enough Republicans who were unable to vote in that one district to have carried the state for Harrison.

Trouble in the Knights of Labor.

That Mr. Powderly's is the ruling mind in the general assembly at Indianapolis, has been evident for some time. The "one man power" advocated by him in his annual address is having its effect. Section 15 of article 3 of the constitution was amended by the committee to provide that the elective offices shall be general master workman, general worthy foreman, general secretary-treasurer, general director of women's work; the general executive board shall consist of four members besides the general master workman, and the general co-operative board shall consist of two members besides the general worthy foreman. But the place where Powderly's influence most appears is in section 16 of the same article, which shall hereafter provide that the general master workman shall be chairman ex-officio of the general executive board, and shall, as soon as practicable, submit to the general assembly the names of eight persons, eligible under the constitution, from which the general assembly shall select four members; this shall be done as soon as possible, and at the same session at which the general master workman is eleted. The report of the committee was adopted by more than the required two-thirds majority.

T. B. Barry issued a formal opinion letter to delegates He says:

In violation of all law of knighthood and justice, I have been denied a fair trial or an opportunity to be heard in my defense, and you by your action placed yourself in full accord with the unlawful and unwarranted action of the general board, who, being unable to answer my charges and fearing to meet me, resorted to all manner of intrigue to override the constitution and deny me the right of a fair trial such as guaranteed to every Knight of Labor. Your action is contrary to all law and decency. You have outraged justice, lowered your manhood and misrepresented your constituents by your vote and false reports and burying your actions in silence on your return home, as has been done after past sessions of the general assembly. This time your constituents will be given the truth by those who have the courage of their manhood. Since you have refused to give me an opportunity to defend myself, I will now publish all former charges and I defy you or those whom you assist by your vote to prove them false. I will prove from documents and witnesses the correctness of my statements, and uncover the mask of sham reform from the designing hypocrites who are now deceiving humanity.

I can prove that $1,250 of poverty's money was paid Tom O'Reilly on the order of T. V. Powderly and John W. Hayes, when he was not in the employ of, nor had he rendered service to the knowledge of the general officers. I can prove that from 10 to 14 persons, who were not members of any union, were employed at the general office of the general executive board and journal department and that 10 or more Knights of Labor were discharged. (Various similar charges were here enumerated). Can Mr. Powderly or any of his friends name a strike or lockout that was ever settled by him in the interests of labor? Volumes might be written of the defeats of labor undertakings through his cowardice or treachery. He has given much buncombe to the order about his overwork, and has a standing notice inserted in the Journal; notifying the order not to annoy him with letters or invitations to lecturers, etc. The treasurer's report shows an expenditure of $96.50 by the general master workman for postage. Granting that all the matter sent out from his office was by letters, it shows the amount of work performed by him or his clerk was less than 16 letters per day. John W. Hayes informed me that "Terry had completed his studies of law and could be admitted to the bar at any time he made application, and he was now studying the languages." No doubt, after his studies of languages are completed, the social problem will be solved for him if not for poverty, who foots the bill.

In conclusion, to the representatives I will say, in view of these facts, and others which I might enumerate, you must appreciate your position.

T. B. BARRY.

The Whitechapel Murderer.

London was thrown into intense excitement again by the report that another victim had fallen under the hand of the Whitechapel ghoul. The police immediately cut off communication with that quarter. Crowds of people gathered to learn all the ghastly details of the tenth murder and mutilation, but it was all a good deal of a "scare." No murder was committed, but one was attempted and frustrated. According to the story of the woman upon whom the assault was made, the man had accompanied her to her room, struck her once with a knife but was frightened away by her cries for help. The woman claims to be fully able to identify the man.

The police are loth to believe that this attempt was made by the original murderer, and many are of the opinion that the woman, who is of the very lowest class of abandoned creatures, inflicted the wound herself while drunk, as she only sustained a slight abrasion of the throat.

The principal reason given by the police for their belief that the morning's attempted murder was not the work of the real Whitechaple fiend, is the fact that both the would-be murderer and his intended victim drank themselves into a state of inebriety, a condition that the perpetrator of the previous crimes was obviously free from, and then went to an ordinary lodging house, at the door of which a government inspector is always in attendance. This circumstance, together with the fact that the time of attempting to kill the woman was as ill-judged with reference to the escape of the murderer as the place, induces the belief that the man is a maudlin imitator of "Jack the Ripper," who will be exceedingly unlikely to repeat his performance.' Nevertheless, if he is caught in the vicinity of Spitalfields, he will certainly be lynched. It is significant, however, that, in spite of the asseverations of their conviction that the assult upon the woman cannot be connected with the chain of Whitechapel butcheries, the police are, if possible, putting forth greater exertion than ever to accomplish the arrest of her assilant. The really interesting incident of the day is another letter from "Jack, the Ripper," dated Portsmouth. Here it is:

Dear Boss:

"It is no good for you to look for me in London, because I am not there. Don't trouble yourself about me till I return, which will not be very long. I like the work too well to leave it long. Oh, that was such a jolly job, the last one. I had plenty of time to do it properly. Ha! Ha! The next lot I mean to do with a vengeance—to cut off their heads and arms. You think it is a man with a black mustache. Ha! Ha! Ha! When I have another you can catch me; so good bye, dear boss, till I return. Yours,

JACK THE RIPPER.

The letter is in the same handwriting as the one received just before Mary Kelly was murdered.

The Iowa Elections;

The deputy United States marshalls returned from the so-called Des Moines river lands, have set thirty families with their household goods out in the highway. These have all been upon lands owned by one Litchfield of New York. Officers begin at once upon a batch of 100 ejectment writs against occupants of land now owned by Col. Thomas Mell, a millionaire land owner of Clinton, Ill. No serious trouble has been had so far, and the settlers are giving away before the inevitable, many of them buying their homes. There will probably be no resistance. These lands were originally granted to the State of Iowa in 1846 for the improvement of the Des Moines river. The grant was originally understood to convey every alternate section within five miles of the Des Moines river from its mouth to its source. Afterward the point was raised that the act as passed did not in fact convey any lands above "Raccoon Forks," where the city of Des Moines now stands. This question was carried to the supreme court of the United States, and there decided against the Des Moines River Navigation company. In 1861 the river company secured the passage by congress of a joint resolution construing the original act of 1846 and declaring it to cover all lands to the source of the river. In the meantime the government had thrown the lands above Des Moines open to settlement, and many homesteaders had located upon these lands, especially in Webster, Hamilton and Boone counties. The joint resolution of 1861 put another phase on the subject. The settlers held up their patents and homestead certificates, declaring that they were on the lands by authority of the government through the general land office and claimed their homes. The river company fought for its title as strengthened by the joint resolution and has beaten the settlers at every point even in the supreme court of the United States. The only hope of the settlers since the decision of the last tribunal has been to get an act through congress instructing the attorney general of the United States to bring an action in equity against the company to resume the lands upon the ground of fraud and failure of the company to improve the river as it was to do. Senator Allison got such a bill through the senate several times and two years ago it passed both houses but was vetoed by Cleveland. The work of getting the settlers off the lands has been regarded as an ugly job for years, and has not been very successfully prosecuted heretofore. Though attempted spasmodically, the evicted parties generally moved back next day, and nothing was gained. If new tenants were put on the farms their stock was often shot, their fences let down or crops destroyed. During the litigation many of the old settlers have died, some moved away, and many more have settled with the company, but while the ranks of the original settlers have been depleted, their places have been taken by a mob of squatters, who have no claims upon anybody's sympathy.

Condition of the National Treasury.

United States Treasurer Hyatt, in his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888. says:

The net revenue of the government for the year was $379,266,074, and the net expenditures $267,924,801, the surplus receipts available for the reduction of the public debt being $11,341,373 an increase of $7,870,175 over the year before. As compared with 1887. the revenues were $7,852,807 greater and the expenditures $7,278 less. The treasury balance increased during the year from $69,224,379 to $129,804,242. The net change of $60,579,863 in the balance was produced by an increase of $37,526,468 in the assets and a decrease of $23,053,394 in the liabilities. The silver balance fell off more than $27,000,000. The principal increase of assets was in United States and deposits in national banks, and the principal decrease of liabilities in the public debt and the funds for the redemption of national bank notes. There was a net decrease of $74,798,920 during the fiscal year in the principal of the interest-bearing debt. The total purchases on bonds for the sinking fund and out of surplus revenue were $51,464,300, the net premium paid, exclusive of accrued interest, being $8,270,842.46. The gold and silver coin and bullion in the country, and all kinds of notes and certificates outstanding on June 30, 1887, amounted to $1,025,259,882, and on June 30, 1888, to $2,093,562,072. The stock of gold and silver increased during the year from $1,007,513,901 to $1,092,391,690.35, mostly in gold. The increase in the volume of the paper circulation was $83,424,400, resulting from an increase of $110,319,955 in the amount of certificates and a falling off of $26,895,554.55 in the total notes and fractional currency. The redemptions of United States notes at the treasury during the year amounted to $63,352,000. Since the resumption of specie payments only $26,736,464 have been redeemed in gold. With the increase of coin certificates, of which there are now more than of legal tenders, the importance of the latter in the circulation has declined. The denominations below $10 are being displaced by silver certificates, and those above $100 largely by gold certificates. The volume of gold certificates outstanding increased $20,536,333, reaching $142,023,150, the highest point yet noted at the end of any fiscal year. Taking into account the decrease of the amount in the treasury the total increase of the circulation was $29,901,143. There were issued $105,896,000 of silver certificates, mostly of the denomination of $10 and under, and $21,047,378 were redeemed. The amount outstanding increased from $145,543,150 to $229,401,772. The increase in the actual circulation was $58,431,707. It had been imposoible to meet the demand for the denominations of $1 and $2, and, in consequence their issue was suspended between Oct. 18, 1887, and Feb. 3, 1888. Since the latter date the treasurer has been able most of the time to furnish them as they have been asked for. The coinage of silver dollars during the year amounted to $32,484,673, making the total coinage $299,424,790. The increase of the net distributions was only $39,156.

Emperor William Peaceful.

The German reichstag reassembled on the 23d. Emperor William opened the session in person. In his speech he said that the tours he had recently made had convinced him that the desire for imperial unity was deeply rooted in the people. He referred to the inclusion of Hamburg and Bremen in the German customs union, and to the conclusion of a commercial convention with Switzerland. He was gratified to know that trade had improved, and said that the prospect of higher prices for farming products justified the hope of an improvement in agriculture. He emphasized the pacific character of Germany's foreign relations and policy, and said that his visits abroad, which had been undertaken with a view to effecting an understanding in the interests of peace, had caused universal confidence in the maintenance of peace. The emperor made no reference to any military bills or credits, and touched but briefly upon East African affairs. The emperor says: I do not hope to banish from the world, by means of legislation, mankinds misery and distress, but I consider it the duty of the government to alleviate the same. Germany's relations with all the foreign powers are peaceful, and my efforts to strengthen such peace are unceasing. The alliance with Italy and Austria has no other object. To bring unnecessarily the miseries of even a victorious war upon Germany is incompatible with my Christian faith and my duties toward the German people Actuated by these feelings, I considered it my duty after my accession to the throne to personally greet our allies and also the friendly neighboring monarchs, and seek to establish cordial relations between them and Germany. The confidence extended to me and my policy everywhere I visited justifies the hope that I and our allies are the friends of peace.

When the emperor entered the chamber of the reichstag he was received with cheering and his speech was heartily applauded. When he retired the emperor was given an ovation by the members, all of whom remained standing until he had go. The president then called the body to order and the budget was presented. It balances at 949,103,907 marks. It includes appropriations for the several new war ships to be built in addition to those already building. The additions comprise four iron clads, nine smaller armed vessels, seven corvettes, four cruisers, two dispatch boats and two torpedo boats. The budget committee announced that the existing war ships were still serviceable but were becoming unadapted to the times. Therefore they urged the necessity of creating the nucleus of a first-class navy, comprising ships of from 9,000 to 10,000 tons, expending under this head 110,800,000 marks, to be distributed over a period of ten years. The budget also provides for increasing the army and expending 7,000,000 marks, mainly for victualing purposes.

Slave-Driving in Massachusetts.

Charles T. Parsons, of Northampton, Mass., notorious for hiring ignorant immigrants at Castle Garden and leasing their services to farmers, was arrested for having a Polander dressed only in overalls, shoes and a thin coat, chained to the seat of his buggy and suffering intensely from the cold, which literally froze the tears on his purple cheeks. The people were greatly excited over the matter, and Parson's arrest is all that saved him from being mobbed. He will be tried for assault, false imprisonment and cruelty. Parsons stated in an interview that the Pole was secured by him at Castle Garden last May. For the first few months the Pole worked well, but later began to act queerly and show signs of insanity. Finally escaping, he was brought back to Northampton. Parsons says he tried to get the fellow to work for him, but soon concluded from his queer actions that the man was insane and decided to send him back to New York where his countrymen could take care of him. He chained him, Parsons said, to prevent him from getting away. Some Holyoke Poles interviewed the victim of the affair and learned his story. He is twenty years old, and came to this country last spring on his own accord. He says he had to work very hard from morning until 11 o'clock at night, while Sunday he was kept at work in the barn. He had been promised $12.50 a month for his services, but never received a cent. When work failed he returned to Parsons', but was not well treated, Parsons put him into the wagon and bound him by force. On his way to Holyoke he says Parsons stopped several times and left him so long that he was nearly frozen when he reached the city. His only relatives in this country are two cousins at Pittsburg, Pa.

He said he would come back after awhile if the newspapers did not roast him too hard.

A Clever Cow.

I saw a very curious thing the other day. We were walking in the country past a lot of orchards, and we noticed that the cows that were feeding in them had their heads fastened down by a kind of bearing-rein, so that they could graze but could not raise their heads to eat the trees. While we were looking we noticed a cow go up to an apple tree and wedge in the stem between her horns and neck and deliberately shake the tree and bring down a shower of apples; she and the others ate them up and then she went to another tree and shook that, and so on. It was the funniest thing I ever saw; she always chose young trees that would shake easily. I pointed it out to a French woman standing near and she said she had often watched them and thought how clever the cow was. It was always the same cow that did it, and she did it as systematically as a schoolboy, never attempting to shake an old, stiff tree. —Dieppe Letter in Spectator.

Courting in Old Times.

Of the following letters, one is from Mr. John Wise, father of the late General Henry A. Wise, written to General A. Cooper, seeking permission to address his daughter, and the other is General Cooper's reply. In Mr. Wise's letter he says:

"Feeling myself irresistibly impelled by inclination, and prompted by a sense of propriety, I have presumed now to address you upon a subject of importance and delicacy. Having conceived an affection for your daughter (Miss Sally). I beg leave to solicit your permission to make address to her, and at the same time let me express the hope that should I be so fortunate as to succeed in gaining her affections, my first wishes may not be frustrated by your disapprobation. I have thought proper to make this application to you on the subject in this manner, rather than in person, because my character (if I had acquired any), my condition and my situation in life, are not altogether unknown to you, and if objections are made they can be more freely communicated in this than in any other way. I have hitherto proceeded no further with the lady than merely to obtain her permission to make this application; and, sir, I now pledge you the honor of a gentleman that, in case you have an objection of an unsuperable nature to the proposed union, whatever may be the chagrin, regret and mortification which I may feel on the occasion, I will not disturb the quiet of a parent extremely solicitous, no doubt, for the happiness of a beloved daughter, by persisting any further with her."

Under date of May 11, 1797, General Cooper responded, saying:

"Although the application made by your letter of this day was unexpected, yet my reflections heretofore on the subject have prepared me to answer: That however solicitous I may be for the temporal felicity of my daughter, and the future respectability of my daughter, she is the only proper judge of the person best calculated to make her happy. Respect and impartiality ought to be shown by me to any gentleman that might make his address to my daughter, and I confide in your candor and judgment.

Newspaper Men's Exploits.

From the New York Sun.

The newspaper correspondent at Naples who gained a position behind the chair of Emperor William at the recent banquet, by disguising himself as a waiter, was able to study the royal visitor at short range, but he evidently borrowed the bright idea from similar exploits of the American reporter.

New Yorkers will remember the dinner that Mr. Low, of Brooklyn, gave to R. B. Hayes, a very quiet and elegant affair, of which Mr. Low didn't want any newspaper mention. One of the waiters was a newspaper reporter, who took the spread all in and gave the world the benefit.

A few years ago when Chicago defaulted in paying the interest on its bonds, the finance committee of the common council had a conference with a committee of the New York creditors. The greatest pains were taken to insure the secrecy of the proceedings, but all the same, two newspapers next morning printed two columns apiece of the discussion. Two reporters had crawled under the city hall and found a knot hole in the floor of the committee room, to which one of them applied his ear while the other took notes.

A secret meeting in a Sherman House parlor of politicians who were planning a campaign was reported at column length in a Chicago newspaper by a young man who was snugly tucked away in an unsuspicious-looking cabinet.

Stephen Allen's Pocket-Piece.

Among the victims of the "Henry Clay disaster," (the steamboat destroyed by fire on the Hudson River, during the fall of 1853,) was Stephen Allen, Esq., an aged man of the purest character, formerly Mayor of the city of New York, beloved and esteemed by all who knew him. In his pocket-book was found a printed slip, apparently cut from a newspaper, from which the following rules are taken: Keep good company or none. Never be idle. If your hands cannot be usefully employed, attend to the cultivation of your mind. Always speak the truth. Make few promises. Live up to your engagements. Keep your own secrets, if you have any. When you speak to a person, look him in the face. Drink no kind of intoxicating liquor. Ever live (misfortune excepted) within your income. Make no haste to be rich, if you would prosper. Small and steady gains give competency with tranquility of mind. Never play at any game of chance. Avoid temptatation, through fear you may not withstand it. Earn money before you spend it. Never run into debt, unless you see plainly a way to get out again. Never borrow, if you can possibly avoid it. Do not marry until you are able to support a wife. Never speak evil of any one. Be just before you are generous. Save when you are young to spend when you are old. Read over the above maxims at least once a week.

Are We So Much Wiser.

Because we travel by rail and not by stage or coach, have our messages sent by electricity and not on horse back, our clothes stitched by machines and not by hand. oleomargarine on our breakfast tables instead of butter, and instead of sugar glucose, are we so much wiser and better than our fathers? How many Chicagos are the equivalent of one Athens? How many millionaire manufactures of lard from cotton seed go to the making of one Plato? How many glucose factories equal one Parthenon? Would you swap "Macbeth" or "King Lear" for the largest railroad in the United States? or Paradise Lost" for all the pork ever packed or all the lard ever adulterated?—Bishop Hugh Miller Thompson.

About the Senatorship.

St. Paul Dispatch.

The situation in the contest for senator has presented no new developments of a substantial character of late. Candidates in embryo have appeared in plenty, and some politicians, who ought to have been absolved from any suspicion of youthful friskiness, have here and there put forth suggestions which are intended to test the extent and enthusiasm of the public demand for the assumption by them of the senatorial toga. Others again, the weight and extent of whose ambitions redeem them from the charge of juvenility, receive a sort of spasmodic mention as aspirants for senatorial office. But, generally speaking, the situation remains substantially unchanged.

Mr. D. M. Sabin, of Stillwater, whose official shoes are to be filled, is conducting his canvass in that gliding and silent manner suggestive of a man in his stockings. He has succeeded in conveying the belief that General Benjamin Harrison is at the present moment decidedly uneasy lest his administration should be deprived of the vast sustaining power which would come from the consciousness of Mr. Sabin's immediate proximity to the White House during the coming four yours. The semi-official assurance which was secured through the medium of an Indianapolis paper that cabinet honors awaited the Stillwater statesman has not materialized. Mr. Sabin has not been in Indianapolis within a week and there is no sufficient reason for believing that any system of cipher correspondence has been opened between him and his dear friend, the president-elect. It has been suggested that the reputation which Mr. Sabin has won for himself as a financier, might have been borne on the wings of current rumor to Indianapolis, and that the secretaryship of the treasury might, as a result, have been by this time placed at his feet; but great as that reputation is, and profound as is the conviction in certain quarters of Brother Sabin's skill in finance, his nose is pointed at the present moment, with too much certainty toward the national capitol, rather than toward the treasury building, to admit of any doubt whatever as to his ultimate destination. It is as a profound exponent of great constitutional and economic questions, rather than as as a manipulator of national or corporate finances that Mr. Sabin hopes to shine in the immediate future.

But with Mr. Sabin and all the other aspirants that the next few weeks may reveal in the field, the prophecy is one in which the Dispatch thinks it safe to indulge, that when the legislature is met in joint session the chief function of Mr. Sabin's supporters will be to move and vote that the selection of Hon. William D. Washburne, as senator, be made unanimous.

A Mistaken Idea.

Todd County Argus: In commenting on the result of the election, the Glenwood Minnesotian refers to the republican party as follows:

> If is not pledged against high tariff—for in fact it says in bold English that not a dollar must be taken off the tariff so long as there is a tax on liquors, tobacco, etc.

The editor of the Minnesotian has either not carefully read the platform adopted by the national republican convention at Chicago, or cannot understand the English language. It was the American system of protection that this platform declared for and did not oppose a reduction of the tariff further than it should not destroy this system of protection. We expect to see a marked reduction made in the tariff by the republican party, as we believe it to be overwhelmingly in favor of a readjustment and reduction. But remember the tariff can be reduced without attacking the protective system.

Prohibition Insanity.

St. Paul Dispatch.

One of the declared results of the election of members of the legislature is the apparent defeat of Hon. George F. Potter, of Houston county, by a plurality of five votes in favor of his democratic opponent. Mr. Potter is one of the best known public men in the state and won for himself a large measure of distinction by his valuable services in the last house. He was, indeed, in all that related to skill and experience in legislation, and in the intelligence and zeal of his labors on the floor, the leader of that body.

Too much credit cannot be bestowed on Mr. Potter in connection with the triumph of republican principles, which was the outcome of the recent eletion in this state. To his labors, more than that of any other individual member, was due the success in the lower house which marked the effort in favor of high license. His skill as a parliamentarian and the energy which he displayed—astonishing in one of his advanced years—saved the promoters of that principle much difficulty which they would other wise have encountered.

The temperance element of the state found in him a most valuable champion, and to his efforts was entirely due the enactment of the law, chiefly advocated by prohibitionists, and now known as chapter 123 of the law of 1887, providing for the instruction of the pupils of the public schools on the effect which stimulants and narcotics have on the human system. Notwithitanding all this and the additional fact that Mr. Potter was made the especial object of the hostility of the liquor element, it is to the disgrace of prohibitionists that his defeat, if he is defeated, will be due to their efforts. Out of 103 prohibition votes cast in the entire county Mr. Potter received but ten, and those from the residents of his own town.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the result in this particular case, as announced, will be found to be erroneous, and that Mr. Potter will occupy the seat in the next legislature in which, two years ago, he rendered such valuable service. Neither the republican party, nor the people of the state can well dispense with his aid in the framing of legislation. He was instrumental, during the last session, in defeating some of the most mischievious measures which were sought to be enacted into law, and much of the best remedial legislation adopted was due to his efforts. Mr. Potter has, we believe, avowed his intention to contest the seat with his opponent. If his contest is successful the public will have reason to rejoice.

Devotion of Scandinavians to Republicanism.

Moorhead Weekly News.

The last election demonstrated beyond question the steadfastness and loyalty of the Scandinavians to the grand old republican party. They utterly repudiated the extravagant claims of the democratic party that they were going over to them, on account of the tariff issue, in droves. The Scandinavians come to the United States imbued with a laudable desire to improve their condition in life; filled with a well-grounded belief that they will enjoy more liberty here than in Norway and Sweden; hopeful of becoming possessors of farms, herds and flocks; determined to learn the ways of Americans and to adopt their language, habits and customs as their own, and to get as much benefit out of American institutions as possible.

They are not slow to see that the republican party embodies the most liberal and progressive ideas; that it offers the most freedom and privileges to the individual; that its policies are best for the poor man, who strives to build himself up; that it is the party that has preserved the union; that it liberated four million of people from a galling servitude; that it has by its policy of protection built up the manufacturing industries of the country, encouraged agriculture, furnished employment to labor, increased wages, provided free schools, and opened up thousands of avenues which the honest and industrious foreign-born citizen may travel on equal terms with the native born in the race for success, wealth and fame. They see, too that the republican party is the one which is most loyal to the American system of government, and quickest to defend it from assault by foes within or foes without. Being proverbially loyalists to the fundamental law of the country in which they live, they therefore naturally connect themselves with the republican party. They are proof against the taunts of the democratic party that they serve the republican party blindly, and equally so of their flattery and promises of preferment if they will forswear and forsake it and join the democracy.

All honor to the Scandiavans for their devoted loyalty to and suport of the party which is most true to them and all other foreign born citizens who come to America to find homes and become useful members of the great free republic. No other nationality is quicker to adopt our customs and become true Americans than the Scandinavians.

Toledo Blade: General Harrison will not be hampered by an adverse majority in either house of congress. The senate is republican, and so is the house. He is not the man to take any steps backward in national policy. As to the course of himself and his party, the Boston Journal puts the case clearly and and fully when it says:

> A prudent and progressive policy toward the two great national problems of the civil service and the tariff will enable the republican party to go before the people four years hence so strong that no serious opposition can confront it. Its old adversaries are beaten, demoralized, despondent, and the republican party has only to be true to its best traditions and alive to its great responsibilities to retain control of national affairs for another quarter of a century.

Great Executive Ability.

Cloquet Pine Knot: Col. Graves is vested with great executive ability, and as speaker of the house he will be able to display to the people of Minnesota his great parliamentary qualifications. Let northern Minnesota back him.

Todd County Argus: The next absorbing question with the newpapers of the state after the reverbrations of the election have died away, is that of choosing the next United States senator as a successor to Senator D. M. Sabin. Of course Mr. Sabin himself is a candidate to succeed himself, but there is strong opposition to him in all parts of the state. The only opposing candidate of any considerable strength now prominently mentioned is W. D. Washburn, of Minneapolis. Between the two we have little preference, but without having canvassed the matter we are of the opinion that the people here are inclined to Mr. Washburn as between the two. Ignatius Donnelly has been spoken of as a possible candidate, but we do not believe that his candidacy will find any support in this locality.

The Boy on the Farm.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

It is my impression that a farm without a boy would very soon come to grief. What a boy does is the life of the farm. He is the factotum always in demand, and always expected to do the thousand and one things that nobody else will do. Upon him falls the odds and ends, the most difficult things. After everybody else is through he is to finish up. His work is like a woman's—perpetually waiting on others. Everybody knows how much easier it is to cook a good dinner than to wash the dishes afterwards. Consider what a boy on a farm is required to do—things that must be done, or life would actually stop. It is understood, in the first place, that he is to do all the errands, to go to the store, to the post office, and to carry all sorts of messages. If he had as many legs as the centipede they would tire before night. He is the one who spreads the grass as the men cut it; he stows it away in the barn; he rides the horse to cultivate the corn up and down the hot, weary rows; he picks up the potatoes when they are dug; he brings wood and water and splits kindling; he gets up the horse and turns out the horse. Whether he is in the house or out of the house there is always something to do. Just before school in winter he shovels paths; in the summer he turns the grindstone. And yet, with his mind full of schemes of what he would like to do, and his hands full of occupation, he is an idle boy who has nothing to busy himself with but school and chores. He would gladly do all the work if somebody else would do all the chores, he thinks; and yet I doubt if any boy ever amounted to anything in the world, or was of much use as a man, who did not enjoy the advantage of a liberal education in the way of chores.

Branierd Tribune: The St. Paul Globe once upon a time asked "Who is Harrison." It is beginning to find out.

Winona Herald. There's a good deal of the cruel irony of fate about some of the Thanksgiving Proclamations this year—President Cleveland's or Gov. McGill's for example.

Wells Advocate: The St. Paul Globe's mud machine, aided by the smaller ones throughout the state, did not prevent W. R. Merriam from receiving an old time republican majority Stillwater Gazette: The Globe has discovered the cause of the democratic defeat in New York. The Harlem bridge was so far south that there wasn't room on the south side for the democrats.

Madelia Times: The St. Paul Dispatch comes out in favor of the election of W. D. Washburn for United States senator. We should very much prefer him to Sabin who, it is hoped, will not get there.

La Crescent Patrol: The Wilsons—Tom and Gene—couldn't gain a victory. They had good men against them. They had principles and victory against them. Fate was against them and their records were against them.

Marshall County Leader: It seemes that Ignatius Donnelly was defeated in his candidacy for the state legislature. His defeat was a great misfortune to the state, for his services in the legislature were more valuable than can be estimated.

Mankato Free Press: It is a very pleasant time these days for some of our state papers to fix Gov-elect Merriam's appointments and he will no doubt be under obligations to the boys when he arrives home from the East to find everything all arranged.

Winona Herald: The Pioneer Press publishes a touching pome entitled "The Autumn Wood." There was a time when we democrats thought the autumn would and Grover would; but alas! that time has passed forever. Some how or other New York would't.

Mankato Register: Lewis Baker, of the St. Paul Globe, came up from West Virginia to mould Minnesota over into a democratic state through the Globe's influence, but he has signally failed in this and during the interim West Virginia has slipped away from him. Will Lewis Baker go and soak his head?

Mankato Register: The St. Paul Dispatch and other papers have already begun to agitate the matter of pushing Hon. C. K. Davis for a cabinet position. Mr. Davis is both able and worthy but he has commenced a career as a legislator which his Minnesota friends would like to have him continue through one term at least.

Hoard's Dairyman. The creamery system of dairying relieves the farner, and that generally means, the farmer's wife, of a vast amount of labor, and as dairying is generally done gives better returns than where the butter is mad at home.

Northwestern Agriculturist: A careful examination of the official reports of Holstein-Friesian heifers, shows that a large percentage of sales are to those who are already owners and breeders of these cattle. No better evidence could be given that they are satisfactory and profitable. If the first purchases had been disappointing, the buyer would have been reluctant to buy more, and would have selected some other breed instead. This excellent breed is steadily growing in favor in the west and south, and maintains itself wherever introduced. Only buyers who have selected them with the expectation of making first-class beef cattle out of them will be disappointed. They are bred for the dairy and not for beef.

Chicago Market Review. Dehorned cattle have arrived at the yards in considerable numbers during the past few weeks. They are invariably in good flesh, free from horn wounds or scratches; the hides were sound and the flesh not bruised. Many an honest cattleman has stood gazing at a pen of dehorned steers and become converted then and there. The cattle are better off—there is no boss, no discontent and unrest; they have nothing to do but eat and remain quiet for the fat to accumulate. Said one of the heaviest buyers of cattle, in the hearing of the writer: "I would and do give 15 to 20 cents per hundred pounds more for dehorned cattle than for the same description of horned, simply because I know their flesh is not bruised, and the hides are sound and all right."

Look at the Horse.

American Agriculturist: A horses head indicates his character very much as a man's does. Vice is shown in the mouth and eyes; intelligence is shown in the eye and the breadth between the ears and between the eyes; spirit in the eyes and in the pose, in the mobile nostril and in the active ears. The size of the eye, the thinness of the skin, making the face bony, the large, open, thin-edged nostril, the fine ear, and the thin, fine mane and fore-top, are indications of fine breeding, and accompany a high strung, nervous organization, which, with good limbs and muscular power, insures a considerable degree of speed in the animal. The stupid, lazy horse, that drivers call a "lunk-head," has a dull eye usually, a narrow forehead, and contracted poll. He is not represented in this group, but occurs not infrequently, is always a blunderer, forgets himself and srumbles on smooth ground, gets himself and owner into difficulties, calks himself, is sometimes positively lazy, but often a hard goer. He needs constant care and watchfulness on the driver's part. A buyer of equine flesh should be able to detect the good and bad qualities of the animal he contemplates purchasing. This valuable knowledge is only acquired by a careful study of the various parts of horse physiognomy.

Farmer's Review. It is not always a good principle to get rid of a dairy cow just because she is old, or set down a fixed rule for the time at which each cow must give place to a younger female. On the contrary if the old cow is a good eater and gives a profit for what she consumes there is no rerson why she should be got rid of. All of us know that some of these aged cows are the most persistent milkers and breeders and well worth retaining, while a young cow if put in the place of the old one is too often a failure comparatively speaking. If a profit is expected from feeding off the dairy cow for the butcher, that process must commence before the cow is aged, for dear food put into an old "done" cow is lost, and at best old cow beef is not a very marketable commodity. It becomes a question, therefore, for the dairymad to decide at what stage in the life history of a cow she should be "dried off," or "fed off."

Mixing Wheat.

Milling World: The English millers are at last determined to have some of the Minnesota and Dakota hard wheat in undoubted purity. But what will it avail them if they mix it with dirty, nasty, beany, peaish, ricey, thin, weak, worthless and ill-flavored Indian wheat to grind? In mixing grains they are on the wrong track, and no quality of grain will atone for their error in that line. Very good wheat mixed with very poor wheat will always produce poor flour. Very good wheat mixed with medium wheat will produce only a medium flour. Very good wheat ground alone is the only thing that can possibly produce very good flour. Most of the fine American wheat sent to Europe has been spoiled there in the grinding, because the grinding is preceded by the insane practice of mixing.

Ripening Cream.

Hoard's Dairyman: A great deal of vagueness exists yet among butter-makers on the subject of ripening cream. A great many men and women who have had a chance, at least, to know better will persist in putting fresh skimmed cream into the churn. Mr. N. G. Gilbert, of New York, made a little experiment to see what the result would be. For about a week he had been getting about five pounds of butter from 100 pounds of milk, but not being satisfied that he was getting all the butter from the milk, he tried the experiment of keeping the two skimmings separate until the second mess of cream was well cured and then putting them together and churning. From one churning thus treated he obtained six pounds of butter to the one hundred pounds of milk. Here was a gain of 20 per cent, all for a little intelligent experimenting.

Northwestern Agriculturist: There is a wonderful difference in the capacity of animals of the same breed to utilize and assimilate food, one gaining rapidly on what will barely sustain life in another. This is not a question of size, but of digestion, and the quality that makes an animal an "easy keeper," seems to be transmitted with as much certainty as other good qualities. For this reason it is important to select a sire who is an "easy keeper," and whose pedigree is made up of ancestors of the same stamp. This quality alone may make one steer profitable and another unprofitable with the same care and feed.

Northwestern Agriculturist: The silo will help Northwestern farmers in one way about which very little has thus far been said; it will enable them to build barns that will shelter stock and food for them during the long winters, at very much less cost than is necessary when hay and dry fodder must be stored in sufficient quantity to provide a winter supply. The silo stores more and better food in the same space, and may be cheaply built. As most of the barns in the Northwest are yet to be put up, the silo will help farmers save money in building them.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.
CROOKSTON, MINN., NOVEMBER 29.

We clip the following items from the Fosston Thirteen Towns of Nov. 16th:

Even O. Enneberg passed through the city on his way to Crookston with the returns from Beltrami County on Wednesday. He says there was not a democratic vote cast is the county.

Surveyor Ralph, of Red Lake Falls, is platting nine blocks on the Thron Mevold place, recently purchased by A. D. Stevens and others.

J. C. Meehan passed through the city Saturday on his way to White Earth. We understand that he will take charge of the cutting of a large amount of cedar timber for telegraph poles.

The rails are now only about two and one-half miles from here and the cars will be running into Fosston on Tuesday next.

Work was completed yesterday afternoon on the additional 8,000 feet of side track. It was all done under the supervision of E. C. Davis, of Crookston, and the way he rushed the work through proved him to be a rustler.

Contractor Sheasgreen, of Crookston, was registered at the Belmont yesterday. He says they have commenced operations in the woods and that about as many logs will be put in this year as there were last.

The new roller flour mill will probably be ready to start up the latter part of next week. The mill is supplied with machinery of the most approved pattern and make, and is thoroughly equipped throughout. It will be under the charge of H. Lindblad, one of the best known mill-wrights in the northwest and a man of large experience in the business.

Business Methods on the Farm.

Northwestern Agriculturist.

Probably no occupation in which men are engaged is carried out with so little regard to business rules as that of farming. And yet no occupation calls for a more rigid adherence to those principles which underlie all business transactions. The farmer requires a more diversified education—a knowledge of a greater variety of subjects than any of the so-called learned professions.

The man who only knows how to turn a good furrow, fit the soil for the seed, check the growth of weeds, and promote the growth of the plant, has not mastered the art of successful farming, nor has the man who knows only how to rear fine horses, sleek cattle, or fat swine, or how to fertilize his fields to the best advantage, raise the best corn or potatoes, the highest yield of oats and barley. The man who to-day really makes a thorough success as a farmer must combine all these elements of knowledge and many more. It used to be said that any fool could be a farmer, but at the present day people begin to realize the fact that the farmer requires the most versatile education. The time has gone by when the haphazard, slipshod, go-as-you-please methods of farming can be made to pay. Agriculture has become recognized as a science. Millions of acres of virgin soil in all our states and territories have been opened up to the plow, and their surplus products are forced upon the markets of the world. The products of the cheap labor of foreign countries are also empted into our midst to glut our markets. The farmers upon the worn soils of the older states, and especially our own New England, must look closely to the details or their business or go to the wall.

What would be thought of the merchant who would sell goods from his counter without knowing their cost? What would be thought of the manufacturer who did not know, to the fraction of a cent, the cost of the raw material and labor put into a yard of cloth? And yet how many farmers can tell the cost of a pound of butter or pork, a bushel of potatoes or corn, or a ton of hay? They sell their products for what they can get offered, not knowing whether they are making or losing.

What is the remedy? When farmers come to realize that farming is a business as much as manufacturing or banking, or buying and selling goods, and by a careful keeping of accounts with every branch of their operations learn to figure the cost of every article they produce, then a successful beginning will have been made. Let them keep debt and credit with every acre of corn, potatoes, beans or grain. Charge each acre with the interest on its value, the probable amount of fertilizing material used by the crop, the cost of labor in its care. Credit it with the market value of the crop produced. The difference between the two will represent the profit or loss.
